OPENING OF THE ORAL PROCEEDINGS

The PRESIDENT: Before turning to the judicial business of today's sitting, I have first the melancholy duty of recording the passing of two eminent former members, both of them also Presidents, of this Court.

Sir Percy Spender, who died on 3 May 1985, served as a Member of the Court from 1958 to 1967, and was elected President for the period 1964 to 1967. He had previously combined a career as a practising lawyer in his native Australia with active participation in politics; he was for 14 years a member of the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Australia. He held numerous ministerial posts, including the Ministry for External Affairs and Ministry of External Territories, and thereafter served for seven years as Australian Ambassador to the United States of America. On the international level, he took an active part in the United Nations General Assembly, of which he was Vice-President at the Fifth Session, as well as the International Monetary Fund and numerous international conferences. He was an active and energetic Member of the Court, and a vigorous President. In that capacity, he found himself charged with the delicate duty of using the President's casting vote in the controversial circumstances of the South West Africa case, a responsibility which he accepted with characteristic courage. His attentive concern for the special problems and duties of the presidential function also found expression in an article in a legal journal which is almost the only authoritative published study of the subject.

On 1 September 1985, Sir Muhammad Zafrulla Khan died at the age of 88. He began the practice of law as long ago as 1914, but soon began what was to become a very distinguished political career, first in British India, and then, after independence and partition, in Pakistan, of which he was Foreign Minister for seven years. His judicial career in the Court was unusual in that it fell into two distinct phases. He was elected a Member of the Court in 1954, and served as its Vice-President from 1958 to 1961. He then pursued his distinguished career in the political organs of the United Nations, serving as Permanent Representative of Pakistan to the Organization and as President of the Seventeenth Session of the General Assembly in 1962-1963. He was then re-elected to the Court from February 1964, and the respect and confidence of his colleagues was marked by his election as President of the Court for the period 1970 to 1973. He will be remembered as a judge who happily blended legal insight with shrewd political acumen; and as a President, he was gifted with a courteous authority which did much to ensure the efficient functioning of the Court, as it had also of the General Assembly.

I invite all those present to stand for one minute's silence in memory of the late Sir Percy Spender and Sir Muhammad Zafrulla Khan.

I have also to record with regret the resignation of a Member of the Court. On 23 August 1985, Judge Platon Morozov, who had been a Member of the Court since 6 February 1970, addressed to me his resignation as a Member of the Court in view of continued deterioration in the state of his health. His colleagues, who have greatly admired the fortitude with which he has devoted himself to the discharge of his duties despite continued and increasing ill-health over recent months, will share Judge Morozov's own disappointment that he has not been able to complete his mandate, and feel the greatest sympathy for him in his illness. He has been for us a stimulating and hardworking colleague, admired for his vigour in debate and his tenacity in advancing the view which he has believed to be right. We wish him a speedy return to health and a long and happy retirement.

The Court meets today to hear oral argument on the merits in the case concerning Military and Paramilitary Activities in and against Nicaragua (Nicaragua v. United States of America). The proceedings were instituted by an Application filed on 9 April 1984, accompanied by a request for the indication of provisional measures under Article 41 of the Statute of the Court. By an Order dated 10 May 1984, the Court indicated, pending its final decision in the proceedings, certain provisional measures, and decided that, until the Court delivers its final judgment in the case, it would keep the matters covered by that Order continuously under review.

The United States having contended that the Court was without jurisdiction to deal with the Application, and that it was inadmissible, the Court further decided that the written proceedings in the case should first be addressed to the questions of jurisdiction and admissibility. Following the filing of a Memorial and Counter-Memorial on these questions, and oral proceedings held in October 1984, the Court, by a Judgment dated 26 November 1984 found that it had jurisdiction to entertain the Application on the basis of Article 36, paragraphs 2 and 5, of the Statute of the Court. At the same time, on one aspect of the case, the relevance and effect of a reservation attached to the United States Declaration of acceptance of jurisdiction of the Court, the Court referred to Article 79, paragraph 7, of the Rules of Court, and declared that the objection by the United States to jurisdiction based on that reservation did not possess, in the circumstances of the case, an exclusively preliminary character, and consequently did not constitute an obstacle for the Court to entertain the proceedings instituted by Nicaragua. The Court further decided that it had jurisdiction, so far as the Application relates to a dispute concerning the interpretation or application of the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation between the United States and Nicaragua, on the basis of Article 24 of that Treaty. It thus found that accordingly it had jurisdiction to entertain the case, and found also that the Application was admissible.

On 18 January 1985, a letter from the Agent of the United States of America was received in the Registry, stating that the United States had given the deepest and most careful consideration of the Judgment of 26 November 1984, to the findings reached by the Court, and to the reasons given by the Court in support of those findings. The letter continued:

> "On the basis of that examination, the United States is constrained to conclude that the Judgment of the Court was clearly and manifestly erroneous as to both fact and law. The United States remains firmly of the view, for the reasons given in its written and oral pleadings that the Court is without jurisdiction to entertain the dispute, and that the Nicaraguan Application of 9 April 1984 is inadmissible. Accordingly, it is my duty to inform you that the United States intends not to participate in any further proceedings in connection with this case, and reserves its rights in respect of any decision by the Court regarding Nicaragua's claims."

On 22 January 1985, the President of the Court made an Order, referring to the United States letter, and noting that the Agent of Nicaragua had informed the Court that his Government maintained its application and availed itself of the rights provided for in Article 53 of the Statute whenever one of the Parties does not appear before the Court or fails to defend its case. By that Order time-limits were fixed for the written proceedings on the merits of the case. The Memorial of Nicaragua on the merits was filed on 29 April 1985, but no Counter-Memorial was filed by the United States of America within the time-limit fixed therefore (31 May 1985), nor did the United States seek any extension of that time-limit. Accordingly, the case became ready for hearing on 1 June 1985.

I note the presence in Court of the Agent, counsel and other representatives of the Republic of Nicaragua; I note further that no representative of the United States of America is present in Court.

In accordance with its usual practice, and pursuant to Article 53 of the Rules of Court, the Court has decided, after ascertaining the views of the Parties, that copies of the pleadings and documents annexed shall be made accessible to the public with effect from the opening of the present proceedings.

The Court adjourned from 10.20 a.m. to 10.40 a.m.

AGENT FOR THE GOVERNMENT OF NICARAGUA

Mr. ARGÜELLO GÓMEZ: Mr. President, Members of the Court, today we face empty chairs on the side of the Respondent State. This is not the first time this has occurred. Just five years ago this Court and the United States Government under President Carter faced the same empty chairs when Iran failed to appear before this tribunal.

But the real novelty of the situation is that for the first time in the history of this Court and that of its predecessor, a Respondent State fails to appear after the Court has found that it has jurisdiction.

Once jurisdiction has been found, there is no shadow of a doubt as to the obligatory nature of a country's appearance. That is why the decision of the United States Government to disobey this tribunal has sent shudders throughout the international legal community and, yes, throughout the legal community in the United States itself.

Nonetheless, the distortion of reality by the present Administration of the United States is such that the fact that they appeared in the jurisdiction and interim measures phases of this case has been attempted to be portrayed as an example of good faith and respect for international law. As if the fact of accepting an invitation only to insult the host were a sign of good manners, as if the fact of being in contempt of court were a sign of obedience of the law.

When the present Administration of the United States announced that it would not participate further in these proceedings, it made a public statement that its principal reason for doing so was that this Court is a biased tribunal and that the United States could not hope to receive impartial treatment by the Court. Although it is generally in bad taste to recall the bad manners of others, I feel impelled to mention this fact because it sheds light on the character and actions of the accused Government and is useful in analysing in absentia the justifications this Government has for its illegal actions against Nicaragua.

In passing, it is useful to point out the obvious contradiction in affirming as reasons for non-appearance that the Court has no jurisdiction and in the same breath uttering contemptuous remarks on the impartiality of a Court before which the United States has been or has attempted to be a party to, many times in the past.

In passing, it might be useful to recall that in April of last year when Nicaragua initiated this case, this Court in view of the urgency had to suspend hearings that were at that moment going on in a case concerning the United States and Canada.

Nicaragua has confidence in the justice of its cause in the fairness and juridical impartiality of this highest of world tribunals and, yes, Nicaragua is also confident that some time in the future a law-abiding Government in the United States will honour the judgment rendered by this Court and accept the moral necessity of the rule of law.

Article 53 of the Statute states:

> "1. Whenever one of the parties does not appear before the Court, or fails to defend its case, the other party may call upon the Court to decide in favour of its claim.

2. The Court must, before doing so, satisfy itself, not only that it has jurisdiction in accordance with Articles 36 and 37, but also that the claim is well founded in fact and law."

In the present instance, for the first time we have a situation in which the Court has satisfied itself that it has jurisdiction. This finding of the Court was taken after hearing lengthy arguments of all the legal talent that a world power could muster. No new arguments or facts have been presented since that decision was taken that could — if that were possible — modify that finding of the Court.

Another particularity of the present proceedings is that in the initial phase of the interim measures of protection, all the salient facts of this case were presented. The United States participated in full in that phase with an impressive array of legal advisers; they had adequate opportunity to dispute the facts and their legal significance. In other words, this is not a case in which the absent party has not had legal opportunity to dispute the facts or the law, and that therefore the Court has to supply arguments the other party might have made in order to fully satisfy itself. This is very clearly a case in which the United States Government and its formidable legal team ran out of arguments and preferred to contemptuously disregard these proceedings, this tribunal and the rule of law.

The facts in this case are a matter of public knowledge. No one in the world has seriously disputed their veracity. They are backed by ample admissions made at different periods by the highest authorities in the United States Government.

The original argument put forward by the United States Government before this Court, alleging some purported right of collective self-defence, in itself, is an admission that the facts before the Court are true but that they were supposedly justified by this right of collective self-defence.

Professor Brownlie will address the legal consequences of this admission. At this point I will only emphasize that even this pretence of collective self-defence has been publicly abandoned by the United States Government.

As soon as the United States announced its intention of not participating further in these proceedings, the hypocritical excuse of self-defence was immediately dropped, and President Reagan stated on 21 February of this year that it was United States policy to seek to remove the Nicaraguan Government. He emphasized this policy in the most incredibly arrogant fashion by stating that it would only change if the Nicaraguan Government cried "Uncle".

In late April of this year, Nicaragua's legal team had a meeting in Washington, D.C., to put the finishing touches to our Memorial on the merits of this case.

Our meeting coincided with debates in the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States on President Reagan's request for further funding for the mercenary army.

Mr. President, Members of the Court, my personal impression on seeing these debates on public television channels is very difficult to describe. There we were preparing a very careful legal argument backed by nearly 1,500 pieces of documentation to prove to this Court that the United States Government was doing precisely what was being publicly discussed by the United States Congress.

The facts are very clear, they are in the main in the public domain and certainly the thousands of documents we have already introduced to this Court, prove the obvious.

Nonetheless, for the purpose of this hearing we have brought up to date the documentary evidence and have proposed to this Court the testimony of very qualified witnesses. These documents and witnesses together with all the documentation previously introduced will certainly satisfy the Court that Nicaragua's claims are well-founded in fact and in law.

On June 19 of this year several United States marines were killed in El Salvador. A month later, a letter was delivered to my Government by the United States Ambassador in Nicaragua, throwing responsibility for that incident on Nicaragua and threatening the use of force if "acts of terrorism against United States citizens . . . (occurred) . . . in other countries of Central America, or elsewhere".

In effect, the United States Government was making Nicaragua responsible for any acts against its citizens anywhere in the world. President Reagan went so far as to include Nicaragua in a list of five purported terrorist nations.

In its answer Nicaragua recalled that the United States actions against Nicaragua constituted acts of State terrorism and that these activities were precisely the subject-matter before this Court and invited the United States Government to defend itself before this tribunal and further invited the United States to present any evidence it claimed to have against Nicaragua before this tribunal.

The same offer was publicly made by President Ortega of Nicaragua before a concentration of more than 500,000 people that gathered this past July 19 to celebrate the sixth anniversary of Nicaragua's revolution. In effect, the President's speech centred on these proceedings and the hope for peace they represented for Nicaragua.

The invitation made by President Ortega to President Reagan is answered today with an empty chair. The seat of justice is definitely empty in the United States.

Nicaragua's claim that the United States is responsible of practising State terrorism is based on the facts before this Court.

It may be recalled that the methods and actions employed in the policy of the United States against Nicaragua include among others the following:

(a) the mining of Nicaraguan ports;
(b) the attack against fuel storage facilities at the port of Corinto, which rendered necessary general evacuation of the population of that port;
(c) the systematic murder and abduction of peasants, elderly persons, women and children by mercenary bands financed by the United States Government;
(d) the criminal assault on a passenger aircraft belonging to a Nicaraguan State airline in Mexico;
(e) the explosion in the baggage claim area of our international airport which caused the death of four airport workers;
(f) the manual entitled Psychological Operations in Guerrilla Warfare produced and distributed by the Central Intelligence Agency, which is an instruction and a guide to commit acts of terrorism.

Mr. President, Members of the Court, on 19 July 1979 the Nicaraguan people overthrew the Somoza dictatorship that had received the political, military and financial backing of the United States Government during nearly five decades. In that period, United States companies made large profits in gold, mining, banana production, lumber and other businesses. These companies were seen by the Nicaraguan people as partners of the Somozas in the rape and exploitation of Nicaragua.

After similar social changes in other countries, the anger of the people was manifested many times by acts against the lives and property of United States citizens and businesses.

Nothing like that happended or has happened to this day in Nicaragua. No American lives were threatened or hurt. No American businesses were confiscated.

As a matter of fact there are thousands of United States citizens living inside Nicaragua, and hundreds of American citizens visit Nicaragua every month with no danger to their lives except that coming from the activity of the mercenary forces to which every living being is subject to in Nicaragua.

This point serves to emphasize the incredible distortion of reality portrayed by the United States Government in pretending to justify aggressions against Nicaragua, the same distortion of reality that the United States perpetrated when it publicly accused this most respected international tribunal of bias.

The normal consequence of State responsibility is the payment of compensation and in the circumstances of this case this aspect of the matter looms large. As the Court will recognize, this is inevitable for not only have heavy losses, both human and material, been caused as a direct result of United States action but a major tactic of the United States Government has been to create critical weaknesses in Nicaragua's economy and infrastructure in order to achieve its publicly stated purpose of overthrowing the lawful Government of Nicaragua.

For practical and technical reasons, on behalf of my Government, I am requesting the Court to reserve the issue of compensation for a separate phase of these proceedings, and there are, of course, precedents for this course. This request will be formally renewed when I present submissions at the conclusion of the oral argument.

In my submission the separation of the question of compensation is justified by considerations of logic and convenience and this proposal underlines the importance of the question for Nicaragua. The significance of the question will also be evident when Mr. Huper, the Minister of Finance in my Government, gives his oral testimony. While the process of the assessment of the compensation due to Nicaragua must lie in the future, I would like to make a suggestion concerning the methods of assessment, particularly with reference to direct damage caused to the economy of my country by the military and paramilitary operations directed by the United States. I would propose that the assessment of compensation be the subject of a report by an independent specialized organization to be appointed by the Court such as the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund or the United States Economic Commission for Latin America. The proposal is offered in a constructive spirit and with full appreciation of the fact that the Court will control all matters of procedure as it sees fit.

On this year of the 40th anniversary of the creation of the new world organization after the tragedy of the Second World War, on your shoulders rests the responsibility of making international law into an effective instrument for world peace.

Your authority is being challenged by a superpower that wishes to set law aside in order to have a free hand for destroying a small nation.

This challenge started when you gave your Order in May of last year that Nicaragua's sovereignty should be respected by the United States. That Order was blatently disregarded by that Government.

The attacks against Nicaragua have increased since that Order was given. Since then thousands of Nicaraguans have been killed, maimed and left homeless. Every day the newspapers announce new instances of atrocities committed by the mercenary forces.

Three of our witnesses, Commander Carrión, Professor Glennon and Father Loison, will attest to the human suffering this has caused in Nicaragua.

While this continues, recent revelations prove beyond a doubt that the National Security Council of the United States is responsible for the direction of the mercenary forces. This Council, headed by the President of the United States, directs the strategy and even selects the targets to be destroyed by the mercenary forces. In effect, the commander-in-chief of the United States armed forces is also commander-in-chief of the contra forces. Whether this violates American law, as is now being debated in the United States Congress, is irrelevant to these proceedings.

It certainly violates international law and converts the United States Government into a terrorist State.

St. Augustin wrote "set justice aside, and what are kingdoms but robber-bands writ large?". In these proceedings we will prove beyond a doubt that the United States Government has set justice aside and is guilty of State terrorism. Nicaragua challenges the United States Government to defend itself before this tribunal and the world.

Mr. President, Members of the Court, in accordance with the instructions received, Nicaragua will present its arguments after the production of the evidence. For this reason the witnesses, whom Nicaragua has communicated it intends to call, will be examined first. The order in which they will be called will follow the order listed in the communication addressed to the Court, unless the time remaining for the examination of the following witnesses in the order mentioned makes it more expedient to alter the order given. This of course will be communicated as soon as possible to the Court. The first witness Nicaragua requests the Court to call is Commander Luis Carrión, who will be examined by Professor Brownlie.

EVIDENCE OF COMMANDER CARRIÓN

WITNESS CALLED BY THE GOVERNMENT OF NICARAGUA

The PRESIDENT: I call on the witness, Commander Luis Carrión, to make his solemn declaration and then to give his testimony.

Commander CARRIÓN: I solemnly declare upon my honour and conscience that I will speak the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth.

Professor BROWNLIE: With your permission Mr. President, Members of the Court, I shall conduct the examination of this witness.

Question: Please state your full name.

Answer: My name is Luis Carrión.

Q.: When and where were you born?

A.: I was born in Nicaragua on 18 November 1952.

Q.: Where did you receive your education?

A.: Well, I received my primary and secondary education in Nicaragua, then I went to university for two years in the United States and then back to Nicaragua.

Q.: You are an official of the Government of Nicaragua?

A.: Yes, I am an official of the Government of Nicaragua.

Q.: What position do you presently hold and what positions have you previously held in that Government?

A.: I am presently Vice-Minister of the Interior, but I was, until the beginning of 1980, Vice-Minister of Defence.

Q.: Would you please describe the responsibilities involved?

A.: Yes, I am in charge of all State security matters. That includes the searching, collecting and keeping of all the information related to any subversive activities against my country, and it also includes taking the necessary and legal steps to prevent or stop those activities. I have also been appointed by the President as a special commissioner — an extraordinary commissioner — of the Government to the northern provinces of my country — these ones over here (indicates on map) — to co-ordinate all government activities, be these civilian or military. I have to mention that these provinces represent the main war zone at the present moment.

Q.: Could you describe your military responsibilities in more detail?

A.: I have the responsibility, within my responsibilities, to supervise military operations in the area. In carrying on these responsibilities I have to go into the field, talk to the field commanders and I sometimes have to interview prisoners directly, corroborate personally some of the most important information, and inspect weapons and other military equipment that might be captured by our troops.

A.: Yes, I normally wear a uniform.

Q.: Referring to your special responsibilities as First Vice-Minister of the Interior, is it one of your responsibilities to be aware of and to monitor military and paramilitary activities against Nicaragua?

A.: Yes, that is within my frame of responsibility.

Q.: How do you monitor these activities?

A.: Well there are Ministry of Interior officers all around the country on a territorial basis. Whenever a military or paramilitary activity occurs within their territory of responsibility they have been instructed by me to prepare a detailed report on the events that occur. These reports are sent to regional offices and to a national office. This last office is directly under my responsibility.

Q.: Could you tell the Court how long it takes from the time an attack occurs until the information is passed through the reporting system to you?

A.: Yes, I usually receive the information within 24 hours, but certainly before 48 hours after the events occur.

Q.: Are there other sources of information which you use?

A.: Yes, as normal procedure we use several sources of information and we cross-check them in order to arrive at conclusions. Some of these sources are the co-ordination with the Nicaraguan army, our intelligence services, personal interviews, statements from people who accept the amnesty law. I have to inform you that my country, my Government, put into effect an amnesty law by which every person who is involved in military activities against the Government can conduct and live a normal life just by surrendering his weapons. We also have information from people we have infiltrated into the contra groups. These I would say are the main sources of information for us.

Q.: In what form are records kept?

A.: Records of military and paramilitary activities are a part of the whole reporting system we have. They include exact information of date, place, participating forces, civilian and military casualties on the Government side, verified contras casualties and also a summary of the material destruction that occurred as a result of the attack or combat.

Q.: Would you tell the Court when the organized military and paramilitary activities against Nicaragua began?

A.: Organized activities began by December 1981.

Q.: In what condition were the anti-government forces prior to December 1981?

A.: They were just a few small bands very poorly armed, scattered along the northern border of Nicaragua and they were composed mainly of ex-members of the Somoza's National Guard. They did not have any military effectiveness and what they mainly did was rustling cattle and killing some civilians near the border lines.

Q.: What differences did you notice in those activities in that period of December 1981 and thereafter?

A.: After December 1981 we began to observe that contras started to act on the basis of their centralized plans, military training camps were set up in Honduras and in the United States for training the contras, new weapons were delivered to the contra forces and the centralized command was set up in which most of the contra forces were put since December 1981.

Q.: To what do you attribute these differences which you noticed?

A.: These differences were due to a direct involvement of the United States Central Intelligence Agency, CIA, with the contras in the first event, and secondly, they were due to the approval of $19 million by the United States Congress for the CIA to carry on paramilitary activities against Nicaragua in December 1981.

Q.: When did the CIA-trained and equipped forces launch their first attacks against Nicaragua and what form did those attacks take?

A.: The first organized attack occurred at the end of 1981. For the first time the contra offensive would mean the code word "navidad roja", which means Red Christmas time. By this plan, the purpose of it was to launch simultaneous attacks on border posts in the north eastern part of the country, which is a very isolated part of the country, and at the same time try to introduce a larger force in order to take hold of a territory and then ask for international support. The contras could not achieve their purposes, they were rejected back to the camps in Honduras, but there was a rise in civilian and military casualties.

Q.: To your knowledge, was Red Christmas the first plan with a specific name?

A.: Yes, it was the first plan with a specific name. Before that the contras did not even act under a plan.

Q.: You have used the term "contras" to describe the anti-government forces. Can you tell the Court whether that was the term usually employed to describe those forces?

A.: Yes, "contras" is one of the terms usually employed to describe those forces. They are also called "mercenaries", among other names they receive.

Q.: You have referred to the Red Christmas plan and the attacks associated with that. What other attacks did the contras make against Nicaragua at this particular period?

A.: During the year 1982 we saw a gradual rise in hit-and-run attacks across the border, which were increasingly deadly and aggressive. By the beginning of 1982, the end of the first quarter, there were some bombs that exploded — one in a commercial Nicaraguan airline, in a plane, in Mexico airport — and the second exploded in Nicaragua airport. Also, there were blown up, sabotaged, two bridges — one over the Rio Negro river and the second over the Ocotal river. These two bridges are very near the Honduran border, one about here and the second is about here (indicates on map), on the Panamerican highway, which is the main road for Central American international traffic.

Q.: Apart from the hit-and-run raids across the border and the sabotage, what other steps did the contras take against Nicaragua in 1982?

A.: By the end of 1982 they launched another major offensive against Nicaragua.

Q.: Surely, if the contras were organized only late in 1981, why did they not launch a major military offensive for almost a full year?

A.: This is because the CIA needed some time to transform the small and badly-trained groups which constituted all anti-government forces prior to the end of 1981 into a well-equipped army capable of launching co-ordinated attacks. They needed time to recruit new men, to train them, to arm them, to instruct them in the use of new communications equipment, and organize them.

Q.: At the end of the first major military offensive at the end of 1982, how many forces did the contras have?

A.: There were approximately 3,500 men.

Q.: Would you tell the Court where these men were recruited?

A.: Yes, these men were recruited from two main sources. One was the ex-members of the Somoza's National Guard, who were scattered in refugee camps in different countries of Central America and also in the United States.

The second source for recruitment was the peasants, especially those who lived near the northern border. These peasants were recruited forcibly by the contras.

Q.: What was the role of the ex-members of the National Guard?

A.: The ex-members of the National Guard formed the core of the contra army the CIA was setting up. They all were promised and received regular salaries, which ranged from 300 dollars a month for the common soldier, let's say, up to 1,500 dollars a month for the higher officers. These officers were also put as leaders and commanders of the commanding structure and the operational military units.

Q.: Would you please describe the method of peasant recruitment in more detail?

A.: The way that the contras used to recruit the peasants was the following. They usually came to a peasant community very well armed, and then they would go about killing those persons who were most conspicuously identified with the Government, whether they be Government workers or not. These killings would create in the peasant community a climate of terror and fear, after which they would take forcibly the rest of the peasants into the contra unit. As a matter of fact, as this way of recruiting was extended, many communities and small villages were practically depopulated because the peasants had to flee from the contras.

Q.: Were all the peasant recruitments accomplished by means of force?

A.: No, not all of them were recruited by force, but the majority of them were. Up to now there are a little over 1,500 persons that have accepted Government amnesty law, and most of them have declared that they were forcibly recruited by contra units.

Q.: Where did the contras obtain their weapons?

A.: Prior to the end of 1981 the contras had some weapons that the ex-members of the National Guard had taken with them when they fled from the country after the triumph of the revolution. But as the contra forces began to grow as a result of the CIA's recruiting policies, they needed more and more effective weapons so the CIA gave them FAL rifles. The FAL rifle is a modern assault rifle which many modern armies currently use and from then on, that is from the end of 1981 on, the CIA has supplied the contras with all the weapons they have needed.

Q.: Would you tell the Court how the contras were trained, and by whom?

A.: Yes, there were several military training camps set up in Honduras and in the United States. Here in these camps the contras received a general military training which included shooting, tactics, physical exercises and the basic soldier's training. They also were trained in the use of some other weapons like mortars, rocket launchers, grenade launchers and heavy machine guns. Apart from the training camps, there were some training sites for specialized training for special operation groups. They received a training in sabotage, demolition and the use of explosives. In 1982, up to the beginning of 1984, the main part of the training was given by Argentinian mercenaries hired by the CIA from which they received a monetary payment. But since the end of 1981, there were also CIA officers directly involved in the training of the contras, specially or particularly in the area of sabotage and demolition — specialized training for special operation groups.

Q.: In your professional opinion, were there any other significant factors that set the stage for the beginning of the contras' major military offensive at the end of 1982?

A.: Yes. At the end of 1982, the contras received new funds from the United States amounting to $30 million. From this date on, we started to notice that a more or less regular pattern was emerging and that was that after every infusion of funds, the contras would launch a new major offensive against my country. The offensive would gradually diminish as the funds were being used up until the new infusion came, when the pattern would repeat itself.

Q.: Would you please describe the contras' military offensive at the end of 1982?

A.: Yes. The contras' military offensive at the end of 1982 was called "C Plan" or "strategy of terror". The purpose of this offensive was, as in the Red Christmas plan, to take over the town called Jalapa and then install a provisional government and call for international recognition. For carrying out this plan they concentrated the troops around Jalapa right on the border line and from there they did many attacks with artillery support, as they were not able to take over Jalapa, but as a result of this offensive many towns were put under artillery fire and there were many civilian casualties as well as military casualties.

Q.: After this offensive of 1982 was defeated, what were the next steps taken by the contras?

A.: Well, after the 1982 offensive was defeated the contras changed their way of operating. They started to infiltrate groups, small groups at first, deeper into Nicaraguan territory where they would have more objectives within reach, let's say — State farms, co-operatives, grain stores, health centres and so on — and it is during this period when the contras were developing in a regular manner, that ambushes occurred on the road against any vehicle, civilian or military.

Q.: Can you tell the Court what circumstances made this possible?

A.: This was made possible mainly because the CIA had perfected their logistic systems, especially because they had given the contras several aeroplanes which they could now use to resupply the military units operating deep within the country.

Q.: Could you say anything more about the way in which the provision of military aeroplanes to the contras affected their tactics?

A.: Prior to the contras receiving the aeroplanes, contras' military units could only operate within Nicaraguan territory for very short periods of time, because they would run out of ammunition and would use up other equipment; then they had to go out again to the camps in Honduras to be resupplied in order to be able to continue operating. But after they received the aeroplanes they now were able to remain for longer periods of time, and do more damage as a consequence within the territory, because the planes would come right to the place where they were and drop their supplies for them, so that they did not need to go back to Honduras to resupply.

Q.: What evidence did you have of the involvement of the United States Government in these air supply operations?

A.: United States involvement in these air supply operations is very clear. First of all, the planes were provided by the United States; but not only that, the main base from which these planes operate in Honduras — which is called El Aguacate and is somewhere around here (indicates on map), 80 kilometres from the Nicaraguan border line — was improved and enlarged from 3,000 feet to 5,500 feet, by United States Army engineers. This was done in the course of 1983 under the cover of military exercises that were being carried on by the United States in Honduras at that time. The exercises were called Big Pine I and Big Pine II, but there are other ways of United States involvement in the air supply operations. We know this from several sources: one of those sources is a member of the crew of a contra aeroplane that the Nicaraguan army brought down in September 1982, and he declared that the chief of the Aguacate base was a United States officer called, or known as, Major West — we do not know if this is a real or a false name, probably it is a false name. This Major West was in charge of co-ordinating the whole operation — the air supply operation — he directed the planes when they were going to drop the supplies and there was another American officer there who was known as Sergeant Mark. He was in charge of packing the supplies in such a way that they wouldn't break when dropped by the plane. Now, they used to parachute the supplies and this was needed because the guardsmen did not know how to pack these supplies.

Q.: Can you tell the Court what effect these new tactics — these new sophisticated air supply operations — what effect these new tactics had?

A.: The main result of these new tactics was an increased number of civilian victims as a result of contra attacks and a greater degree of material destruction. The contras would come, organizing ambushes against any vehicle going into the rural areas. There were several passenger vehicles ambushed and sometimes every single passenger has been killed. The guerrillas would increase their attacks against civilian objectives, like farms, either State farms or co-operative farms, or individual owners' farms. They attacked and destroyed schools, health centres, grain stores and every piece of economic infrastructure they could attack.

Q.: Were these attacks on the civilian population isolated episodes by certain elements in the contra forces, or did they show some systematic pattern?

A.: Yes, they clearly showed a systematic pattern and these attacks against civilians and civilian objectives took place wherever the different contra military units were operating, no matter how far apart they were from one another. They consistently acted in this manner. We also know from prisoners and some contra leaders' statements that they received specific instructions so as to carry out these types of operation and this is made very clear in the manual the CIA prepared for the contras and which is called Psychological Operations in Guerrilla Warfare.

Q.: The manual in fact is part of the evidence already submitted to the Court, but perhaps I could ask you to remind the Court what the purposes of that CIA manual were?

A.: Yes, this manual was prepared by the CIA and, by the way, the Spanish version is a very poor translation from English. It was prepared with the main purpose of instructing the contras on how they should use terror tactics with great effectiveness. I would like to call your attention to Chapter 3, heading No. 3, also, which is called "Implicit and Explicit Terror" and another heading, No. 5, which is called "Selective use of violence for propaganda effects". Under this heading, but also under other headings, the manual clearly instructs the contras in killing justices of peace, police members, prominent leaders, and, etc., — that means everybody else. They also suggest and give the contras some hints on how to fabricate martyrs for their cause. All of these terrorist instructions have the main purpose of alienating the population from the Government through creating a climate of terror and fear, so that nobody would dare to support the Government.

Q.: How widely distributed, to your knowledge, was this CIA manual?

A.: It was very widely distributed. We know this because we have captured many copies of the manual in combats we have had with different contra military units operating in different parts of the country. But also we know from the statement of a contras leader who defected that about 2,000 copies were distributed among the different military units of the contras, and that every member of the contras was obligated to study the manual, and the commanders of the different forces guaranteed that this would be done effectively.

Q.: Were the methods and tactics described in this manual actually put into operation?

A.: Yes. They were put into operation. There are hundreds of examples of contra activities following the manual's instructions. I will give just some examples in order to illustrate to you how this was done.

On 13 May 1984 in the eastern department of Saslaya, a peasant community was taken over by the contras, and they murdered 34 people, all of them civilian. Amongst the 34 people killed there were five women and nine children who happened to be relatives of some militia men and some of them were members of a peasants' organization which is supportive of the Government.

On 5 October 1984 the contras assassinated the president of a workers' union in La Sorpresa, Jinotega, which is about here (indicates on map).

On 1 September of that same year, in a road that goes from Puerto Cabezas here to the mining district here (indicates on map), a truck belonging to a religious organization, a protestant religious organization, was ambushed, and there were seven civilian workers killed and two civilians wounded, a woman and her little child, only 45 days old.

These are just a very few examples of how the tactics recommended by the CIA manual have been very well applied by the contras.

Q.: Would you please tell the Court whether the contras launched any major offensives in 1983?

A.: Yes, the contras launched a new major offensive by the end of 1983. This offensive was called Plan Sierra — sierra means a chain of mountains.

Q.: In addition to what you have already mentioned, what were the other factors which prepared the way for that particular offensive?

A.: Once again in December 1983 there were funds approved by the United States for the contras. This time they were $24 million.

Q.: What was the number of men in the contra forces at this time?

A.: There were somewhere around 7,000 people.

Q.: And how did this offensive at the end of 1983 evolve?

A.: The first objective of Plan Sierra was again to take over Jalapa — over here (indicates on map) — and install a provisional government who the CIA informed the contras would be immediately recognized by the United States Government.

To achieve this objective they concentrated most of the forces again around Jalapa but also introduced some diverting forces into the interior of the territory. When they couldn't take over Jalapa and the main forces were repelled back to Honduras they changed the main objectives at that point and what was at the beginning a diverting effort changed into the main effort, so they took — I am talking about the first quarter of 1984 — the forces which were defeated around Jalapa and introduced them in this direction with the main purpose of disrupting the economy as much as possible; so they were directed to hit all economic targets possible. And it is of this year, 1984, that material destruction rose very steeply. At the end of the year and the beginning of the year, in Nicaragua we are picking the coffee crop and one specific objective of the contra forces was to make it impossible for Nicaragua to pick the crop. In order to do this they attacked coffee plantations, they killed some coffee pickers, they also threatened coffee growers in order that they would not take the crop from the field, and to make them know that this threat was for real they set afire, destroyed completely, eight farms and killed three coffee growers, I mean I am talking about private proprietors who used to grow coffee. So this was the main effort in the first half of 1984 after the take-over of Jalapa had failed.

Q.: Can you describe the type of military organization which the contras had up to this point?

A.: Up to this point, the main contra forces were all under a single and unified command. The head of this command was something called a joint staff major; this joint staff major was conformed by a CIA officer known as Colonel Raymond and by Enrique Bermudez who is in charge of the military operations on the part of the contras. Under this joint command, there is a complex system of different services for the military combat units. They have a medical service, a public communications service; they have what they call civilian services, a supply centre and what they call the strategic command which is the operational head structure. Under the strategic command there is a logistic section, a school section, that is a training section, a special forces section — what they call internal forces, air force section, and what is known as the tactical operations command. Under this tactical operations command are the operational military units which are called regional commands. The regional commands have perfectly well-defined operational areas where they normally act and they are the superior structure under which are the so-called task forces. Each regional command has under its command three or four task forces which are then subdivided into smaller units.

This is then the structure corresponding to a fairly well-developed army and up to this point, that is what the contra is, a very well-equipped and organized army.

Q.: In your professional opinion did the United States play a role in this organizational structure?

A.: Yes, this structure was designed by the CIA and was implemented by the CIA and the CIA controls its day-to-day operations. Sometimes they even say which force should attack which objective, and this influence of the United States in constructing this complex organization shows even in the use of words. For instance, the phrase "Task Force" which in Spanish, the Spanish literal translation is Fuerze de Tarea, does not exist as a phrase in Spanish. It is just a translation of an English phrase. As far as I know that phrase is not regularly used by Latin American armies. That is just one little example of how even the language shows up the United States influence in setting up this whole structure.

Q.: Were there other ways in which the United States assisted the contra forces?

A.: Yes, the United States assisted the contra forces in other fields, mainly by funds, intelligence, communications, weapons and logistics. I would say these were the main areas in which United States assistance to the contras has occurred.

Q.: First of all I would like to ask how did the United States assist the contras in relation to weapons?

A.: As I said before, prior to the end of 1981 the contras had the weapons they had taken from Nicaragua when the National Guards abandoned and fled to other Central American countries. But when the CIA needed new weapons for the increasing contra force, the CIA just got the weapons, FAL rifles as I said before, and delivered these weapons to them. That was in the beginning. Afterwards CIA AK 47 rifles — which are also very modern assault rifles — were given to the contras. The contras never had to buy weapons in the market. The CIA has always supplied them. And recently the CIA is supplying the contras with a G 3 rifle, which is the German equivalent to the FAL rifle, and it is the one that they are supplying right now. They supply not only rifles, but other types of weapons too. They supply them with a disposable rocket launcher called a light offensive weapon or LOW with a grenade launcher called M 79 grenade launcher, they supply them with mortars of 60 millimetres and 81 millimetres — the last one is considered as medium range, in the practical sense, an artillery weapon. They also supply them with heavy machine guns, mostly M 60. All of these are made in the United States and came directly from the United States to the contras in Honduras. They also supplied the contras with all sorts of high-powered explosives, mainly the plastic explosive known as C 4 and mines of all sorts, anti-personnel mines, anti-carrier mines, of different sizes and types and TNT and other explosive devices for sabotage.

Q.: Did the assistance in relation to weapons go beyond the mere supply of weapons? Were other facilities provided?

A.: I do not understand the question. Would you please repeat it?

Q.: Were other facilities provided such as training in the use of weapons made available, or was it simply a case of the supply of the weapons themselves?

A.: I said earlier in my declaration that the CIA set up a full training structure with specialized training officers to teach the contras how to use these weapons. Many of them never had anything to do with weapons, specially the sophisticated weapons, like some of the mines given to the contras, or the military explosives. The United States provided the contras with the complementary necessary military training, or specialized training, in order that the contras will be able to use these weapons.

Q.: Now I would like to ask about United States assistance to the contras in relation to intelligence.

A.: This is a very important field of assistance from the United States to the contras. The United States makes a regular overflight of Nicaragua with specialized surveillance planes of different sorts. They are very well equipped with photographic and electronic equipment. The United States has some satellites and surveillance functions over Nicaragua. They also have stationed for periods of time specially electronically-equipped ships just off the Nicaraguan coasts and they have installed radar and communications interception centres in Honduras. They also try to get the services of some Nicaraguans who are in the army or some sensitive structure by paying them and from all this array of intelligence gathering systems they collect very exact information about the Nicaraguan army — where the troops are, where they are moving and so on, and all this information is delivered to the contras for their use. This happens every day. The United States gives all the information it can collect and that is of interest to the contras — they give it to them. The United States has also assisted the contras in setting up an intelligence organization. This is another field of assistance for the contras in the intelligence area.

Q.: Was there also assistance in relation to communications?

A.: Yes. There was much assistance in the communications area. In the first place the United States provided the contras with very modern and effective military communications systems. They gave them different types of equipment — equipment that is used for communications between the regional commands and the tactical operations command, or strategic command, those are usually PRC-77 back radios which can be carried on the back. Also the use of a shortwave radio, South Quartz is the name of it, and they also give the contras small walkie-talkies for communications among the small units within a task force or regional command. But I would say that the most important assistance in the communications field has been the preparing of some sophisticated codes for the contras to cover their communications. They also prepare for them conversational tables which are simpler codes for less important communications. The contras had no capacity at all for preparing or manufacturing these types of codes. In the past Somoza's National Guard did not use code — never had codes in use extensively.

Q.: I would like to pursue the question of assistance even further and try your patience more. How did the United States assist the contras in relation to logistics?

A.: In relation to logistics, the United States through the CIA would calculate what the contras needs were in all sorts of equipment, personnel equipment and then deliver those supplies to the contras in Honduras. This flow supply included from a pair of boots up to mosquito repellent. They gave them everything they needed — uniforms, canteens, Sam Brownes, light packs, special caps with a mosquito net and also ammunition for the weapons.

Q.: Apart from the United States involvement with the contras, did United States military or intelligence personnel themselves participate in attacks against Nicaragua?

A.: Yes, on many occasions United States military or CIA personnel participated in direct attacks against Nicaragua.

Q.: Can you say when this began?

A.: This began in September 1983.

Q.: Would you please give the Court, if you can, some examples of direct attacks by United States military or intelligence forces?

A.: In September 1983, a special team from the CIA blew up a pipeline, just out of Puerto Sandino, which goes into the sea, where ships pick up and discharge oil; they used underwater high explosives to do this. They came from a mother ship which was stationed some distance from our coast.

In October of that same year several speedboats armed with 20-millimetre cannons attacked oil storage facilities in the port of Corinto, which is here (indicates on map) and is the main port of Nicaragua. As a result of the attack the three big oil-storage tanks were set on fire. This fire was a very big one and put in peril the whole Corinto population, which is around 20,000 people, and they had to be evacuated from the town to some place else. Many millions of gallons of oil were lost, and the oil storage tanks were completely destroyed.

Another example occurred in September 1984 when several planes and modern attack helicopters made an aerial attack against a military training camp of the Nicaraguan army in a place called Santa Clara, here near the Honduran border (indicates on map). In this last attack there were two United States citizens who participated directly and they got killed when the helicopter from which they were attacking was brought down by ground fire from the Nicaraguan army. They happened to be members of one of the United States states' national guard.

I think these three examples may illustrate to you the direct participation of United States personnel in actions against Nicaragua.

Q.: What were the purposes of these attacks?

A.: The main purpose was to destroy all capabilities of my country for storing or receiving oil. That is why most of the attacks centred on the Puerto Sandino pipeline. That pipeline was blown up several times, not only once, or at least, it was intended to blow it up several times — three times. That is why they also attacked oil storage tanks, in order to completely cripple and paralyse the Nicaraguan economy, and make it impossible for the Nicaraguan Government to carry on their defensive war against the military régime by the contras supported by the CIA. That was the main purpose.

Q.: Apart from these air and naval attacks against Nicaragua by United States forces, were there any other measures by United States forces against Nicaragua?

A.: Yes, there were other measures against Nicaragua. I will mention some just as an example. For instance, at the end of 1983 two United States aircraft-carrier ships, the S.S. Ranger and the S.S. Coral Sea, along with the destroyer known as New Jersey, with escort ships were stationed just off the Nicaraguan coasts in an obvious threat of the use of military force. I have to say that this show of force occurred shortly before the 1983 offensive of the contras began.

On the other side, since the beginning of 1983, the United States has been carrying on continuous military exercises in Honduras, thus stationing there permanently several United States military units, especially intelligence units and supply and service units. Also, the United States made overflights with the most sophisticated surveillance plane that exists in the world up to now, the SR-71, nicknamed "the Blackbird". These overflights were made in such a way that the whole population could hear the sonic boom that this plane makes, creating a sense of fear and unrest among the population. But the most important action that the United States took against my country was the mining of the ports.

Q.: How extensive was the mining of Nicaragua's ports?

A.: The mining was very extensive. Except for minor ports that represented less than 2 per cent of the total commerce of Nicaragua, all commercial ports were mined.

Q.: What was the impact on Nicaragua of the mining of ports?

A.: Well, the mining of the ports first of all had a psychological impact on the whole population because it was tactically a naval blockade or a maritime blockade, not with ships but with mines; people had a feeling of being shut off from the world. But there were other direct effects of the mining of the ports; there were 12 vessels or fishing boats damaged by mines in different ports of Nicaragua, there was a Dutch vessel, a Soviet vessel, a Panamanian vessel, a Nicaraguan vessel, a Japanese vessel and an English vessel among those which received damage. There were also 14 people wounded and 2 people died. There were many vessels which did not arrive finally in port and left the merchandise they were bringing to Nicaragua in the ports of other countries, mainly in Costa Rica's Puntarenas from where we had to bring it to Nicaragua by truck at higher costs. Those were the main impacts of the mining of the ports.

Q.: Did the activities of the contras continue consistently throughout 1984 or were there variations in those activities?

A.: Well, the activities of the contras continued throughout 1984 but they started to decline towards the end of the year and into the first months of 1985. This was in effect a consequence of having used up the last funds they had received in December 1983 and that resulted in a shortage of supplies that determined a decrease in the military activities of the contras.

Q.: How do you know of the interaction between those two things, how could you tell that the absence of additional financial support from the United States resulted in a fall off of activity?

A.: Well, first the decrease in the level of military activity showed up in the daily report we have in my country, Nicaragua; but also from personal interviews and interception of contras' communications we know that there were many contras leaders who were complaining about the lack of supplies. We captured many contras very poorly equipped, uniforms worn out and with very few rounds of ammunition, etc., that make it evident that they were not receiving at least as much supplies as they used to receive years before, but there was even demoralization among the contras forces. And we know also that the main leaders told the commands, that is how they call the base member of the contras command, not to worry that they were sure that the United States would give the backing to them and that the help would come back again soon.

Q.: To what extent did United States control over the contras forces continue during this period?

A.: Yes, the United States continued holding the direction and control of all the contras forces during this period.

Q.: Were there other changes in the United States methods of channelling assistance to the contras during this same period?

A.: Yes, there were some changes. As official funds had not been approved, the United States used some civilian façade organizations to channel the funds to the contras; one of these organizations is the so-called civilian military assistance to which the two CIA mercenaries killed in Santa Clara in September 1984 belonged. But the United States also promoted fund-raising campaigns in the United States and very high government officers and President Reagan himself assisted in different activities related to this fund-raising campaign. I would say that these were the two main changes which made it possible for the contras to keep receiving some funds although in a lesser quantity, but they always could receive some support from the United States even during the period when the official aid was suspended.

Q.: Earlier you referred to a decrease in activity by the contras forces early in 1985. Did there come a time when the contras increased the level of activity once again?

A.: Yes, it happened in June this year, 1985. The contras launched another major offensive.

Q.: In your opinion, did anything happen to prepare the way for this renewal of contra activity?

A.: Once again, the pattern repeats itself. At the beginning of June there was approval by the United States Congress of $27 million more for the contras.

Q.: And roughly how soon thereafter did the activities increase?

A.: Within two weeks.

Q.: What did the contras do when the activities increased? What was their new action and what was the objective of that action?

A.: The new offensive of the contras is called Plan Repunte. This means a come-back plan. The main purpose of this plan was to infiltrate large contra military units more deeply within the territory, trying to operate near the main highway, where there is a greater density of population coming out of their traditional areas which are very sparsely populated and without any — or very few, or a very small — economic infrastructure, with the purpose of increasing the sabotage in areas where they could hit more important targets — for instance, in this area there is one of the most important electric generating plants of the country — but, also, to have an impact in areas which were for the whole country more sensitive politically in order to create an impression of political crisis and to portray the Government as incapable of holding control of the situation. This action was complementary to the economic boycott — the commercial embargo — established by the United States earlier this year. Those were the main purposes of this last come-back offensive, as they call it.

Q.: In connection with this new offensive, what was the extent of the operational dependence of the contras upon the United States?

A.: This new offensive again made evident the dependence of the contras on United States assistance. I have to say that they wouldn't have dared at all to be involved in this kind of operation without very strong and clear support from the United States. They decided this time to operate in areas where the military manœuvring capabilities of the Nicaraguan army had been increased. There are more roads, the terrain is a little bit less hilly, there is a small population which means that our counter-intelligence services and the Nicaraguan army can receive more information more rapidly from the population. So the contras — to come into that type of zone — to try to operate in those zones needed, indispensably, first of all assistance in the intelligence area: they need to receive, with accuracy, what the Nicaraguan army troops are doing, where they are, where are they going, how many they are, what plans they have — everything — in order for the contras to keep the initiative. Otherwise they would lose the initiative, the military initiative, very soon. On the other hand, this being a more favourable terrain for the Nicaraguan army operations, it was expected that combat was going to be more extended and more continuous. That means that ammunition and other military supplies would get used up very rapidly, so the contras also needed to have a very well-assured, steady flow of supplies during the course of these operations. Those are two things that again show how in this offensive they are dependent on the United States assistance to carry on their offensive.

Q.: Can you tell the Court what the impact of this offensive has been so far?

A.: The contras could not carry on with their plans and they were repelled to their traditional operational areas from the new areas they were trying to open. But in the course of the offensive there were three towns along important highways that were attacked by the contras. There were two bridges sabotaged also, on the Panamerican highway — around here — and where the combats were more intense there was also an increase in the number of casualties, both military and civilian. Some economic objectives, some tobacco houses and co-operative installations were also destroyed during the course of this attack and many civilians were murdured by the contra forces.

Q.: What have been the human costs to Nicaragua since the attacks began in December 1981?

A.: I have some figures here. Since the end of December 1981 to August 1985, there have been 3,886 people killed on the Nicaraguan side, on the Government side. I make this distinction because as I said before a good majority of the contras are forced recruited peasants and they also die in this war, and they are not included in this figure. And we had 4,731 wounded people, many of whom will remain crippled for the rest of their lives. And to the crippled and the wounded I would add that more than 40,000 people have been forced to abandon their houses because of the contras and they are fleeing from rural areas to the cities, and this is another human tragedy that is the direct effect of the military aggression.

Q.: In your opinion, what would happen if the United States were to terminate its support for the contras, for example, tomorrow, what in your opinion would be the result?

A.: Without any doubt the war would be over in a matter of a few months, not more than two or three months.

Q.: How can you be so certain?

A.: Well, because the contras are an artificial force, artificially set up by the United States, that exists only because it counts on United States direction, on United States training, on United States assistance, on United States weapons, on United States everything. Without that kind of support and direction the contras would simply disband, disorganized, and thus lose their military capacity in a very short time.

Professor BROWNLIE: Mr. President, this examination has been conducted under the rules and under your direction. I have now completed my examination, but of course, the witness remains at the disposal of the Court.

QUESTION PUT TO COMMANDER CARRIÓN BY THE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDENT: I have one question to ask, which is fresh in my memory, I would like to put it to the witness.

In answer to the question of the counsel, Professor Brownlie, the witness stated, on citing examples of direct attacks on Nicaragua, that in September 1983 there was a special team of CIA that blew up the pipeline with under-water high explosives. Now could this not be sabotage and therefore the responsibility could not be fixed on anyone?

Mr. CARRIÓN: This can be called sabotage, but as far as I can see that does not mean that the responsibility cannot be fixed on anyone, because it is known even through an internal CIA report, which in part was made public, that the CIA organized and executed that sabotage.

The PRESIDENT: Would you have any documentary proof of that fact?

Mr. CARRIÓN: The document is in the Memorial submitted by Nicaragua.

The Court rose at 1.10 p.m.

EIGHTEENTH PUBLIC SITTING (13 IX 85, 10 a.m.)

QUESTIONS PUT TO COMMANDER CARRIÓN BY THE PRESIDENT, JUDGE LACHS, THE VICE-PRESIDENT AND JUDGES SCHWEBEL, SIR ROBERT JENNINGS AND COLLIARD

The PRESIDENT: I will finish my last question, and then request the other judges to ask questions.

The witness deposed before the Court yesterday that Argentine mercenaries, hired by the CIA, had given training to contras from 1982 to 1984. How many Argentinian mercenaries were operating with the contras and what proof was there that they were mercenaries and not volunteers motivated by ideological considerations, or sent by some organization in Argentina with no CIA link?

Furthermore, which nationalities are working with contras and in what numbers and in which capacity? What proof was there that they were paid by the CIA? Was a regular salary visualized or some lump-sum remuneration was paid and if so, how much per person? What was the strength of the contras operating in 1981 and today? How many CIA officers were directly involved and what proof was there of their identity as CIA?

Commander CARRIÓN: I would like to answer the questions part by part.

Commander CARRIÓN: Please.

The PRESIDENT: If you would need time to collect the facts and figures, I would have no objection if you gave the answers in writing within one week. Would you prefer that, or would you like to answer?

Commander CARRIÓN: Let me go over the questions.

The PRESIDENT: Yes, very good.

Commander CARRIÓN: I would like to answer most of the questions now, but for some exact figures that are asked for here, I would like to give them later to the Court.

The PRESIDENT: You can do so.

Commander CARRIÓN: I know that there were more than ten Argentinians operating with the contras from 1982 to the beginning of 1984. It is rather difficult to give the exact number, because they operated under false identities and they tried to hide their relationship with the contras. There are at least two names though that we could get. Those were the names of Santiago Villegas and Oswaldo Valitas. Those are the real names of Argentinians who used to be members of the army intelligence of Argentina. They were discharged from the army and after that they went to Central America to work and operate with the contras.

About the proof of their being hired by the CIA, of course we do not have a receipt signed by any one of them, that sort of thing just does not happen in these kinds of operations. Nevertheless, there are some fairly accurate and believable pieces of information in this sense. First of all, there was a video cassette that was made public by one of these Argentinians, called Hector Francis, where he stated that they received the money for paying all Argentinians working with the contras from the CIA — United States — and he said that the money was usually handed to them in Panama, to one of the Argentinian group in Panama, and he would take the money and go over and give it to the rest of them. On the other hand we have some inside information from people who are infiltrators into the contra groups and who have had many conversations with different Argentinian trainers and in those conversations on several occasions it came up that they were receiving a dollar payment which used to come from the United States. Those are two main sources of information for me to assert that the Argentinians were being paid by the CIA.

About other nationalities working with the contras, we have only identified American citizens and some people from Cuban origin about which we do not know exactly if they were American citizens or not. I have some specific information about that to give you.

Up to now from different sources, mainly prisoners' interviews, I am talking about prisoners who spent some time in Honduras training camps and hold certain medium-level responsibilities within the contra groups. From the public statements by some very important contra leaders in this case the most important public statement comes from a person whose name is José Efren Mondragón, who used to be the second in command of a regional command and this was publicly and directly acknowledged by the contras. From other sources we know that we have identified at least 11 United States citizens directly working with the contras in different matters. All 11 we have identified as being United States citizens and as being officers of the United States Government, the one known as Colonel Raymond used to be, until a few weeks ago, the chief of the team of Americans working with the contras.

In conversations with the prisoners we later caught, other people like Mondragón, they made it very clear that they were CIA officers. But not only that, some of these people had interviews with contras who were later captured or defected from the contras in the United States, and they presented themselves as being CIA representatives — in some cases they even talked in the name of the President of the United States. So we considered this and added it up with many other pieces of evidence, like the approving of funds for the CIA carrying on covert operations against Nicaragua as being very reasonable evidence that these people were effectively members of the CIA. We know there was at least one citizen of Cuban background and there is a document in this case signed by a very large group of contra leaders and which is a letter sent to the Embassy of the United States of America in Honduras, channelled through someone whose name is Colonel Raymond, asking the United States Ambassador to intervene so that this Cuban, who was assisting the contras on behalf of the United States Government, could remain for a longer period of time because he was helping them a lot. This document was handed to my Government by somebody who later defected from the contras and which I think is in the Nicaraguan Memorial presented to the Court, as illustrative proof.

Was a regular salary visualized or some lump-sum remuneration paid and if so how much per person? Does this refer to the contras themselves or to other nationalities working with the contras, in this question?

The PRESIDENT: The other nationalities.

Commander CARRIÓN: Those who used to be regular CIA officers received a regular salary, but when it comes to agents, say the Argentine mercenaries who were not regular CIA officers but people hired outside the United States, outside the agency, to do some jobs for the agency, we could not call what they received a regular salary: it was more like they were working on a contract basis. They received periodically some money which they would distribute among themselves, but within the Argentinian group it was clearly established how much each one was going to receive from the whole amount of money that the CIA handed to them. As to other CIA agents, like some of the people in the so-called political directory of the contras' main organization who happened to be CIA agents paid by the CIA, the money they received cannot be strictly called a salary, because it is not stable. The agency might give them directly some money or might put it in a bank so that when the agent has finished his work he can collect all the money he has received from the CIA which has been deposited in a bank, usually in the United States. People like Adolfo Calero who appears as being the chief leader of the contra organization has received money in this manner.

The PRESIDENT: May I just interrupt you to ask a question? Would you then say that there was a possibility of a nationality other than the contra group to have joined because of ideological intensity and feeling rather than for the sake of money, and the money was merely pocket-money which was given for out-of-pocket expenses: that they were really fired by zeal because of ideological considerations, and therefore they were not war mercenaries?

Commander CARRIÓN: I would not have any doubt that some people might have come out of ideological convictions. Some people in different places of the world might feel that they have a right to go down to Central America and fight there. I think that this has happened in some cases, but by no way are they a majority. The majority of them are there because they are being paid salaries like the Argentinians were, because there was a contra and the CIA officers are there because that is their job: that is what they are paid for. Many Nicaraguans are there just because they are receiving a salary also. There has been public information about mercenaries of other nationalities recently — mercenaries from the United Kingdom, from France and the United States were captured in Costa Rica by Costa Rican authorities and they publicly declared that they had come because they were offered a salary, a regular payment, and also they were offered a life insurance for their relatives in case they got killed.

About the strength of the contras: at the end of 1981 there were between 1,000 and 1,200 people. Today there might be between 10,000 and 11,000, in the contra groups. And the last question about the CIA officers directly involved: I talked about that earlier when I said that we had identified at least 11 United States citizens who were working officially with the contras following instructions from their Government. That is all I have to say, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT: Judge Lachs has a subsidiary question arising out of your reply, so I will give the floor to him.

Judge LACHS: You mentioned yesterday the figure of 7,000 in connection with the estimated force of the contras. So how do you arrive at these figures?

Commander CARRIÓN: Yesterday I referred, if I recall rightly, to the end of 1983. Now I am talking about the present figure, up to this moment.

The PRESIDENT: I now give the floor to the Vice-President.

Le VICE-PRÉSIDENT: Monsieur le Vice-Ministre, hier, vous vous êtes référé plusieurs fois à la date de décembre 1981 comme correspondant à un changement dans l'action des contras et dans l'assistance que ceux-ci recevaient des Etats-Unis. Cela signifie-t-il, selon vous, que les activités des Etats-Unis, faisant l'objet de la plainte du Nicaragua, auraient débuté en décembre 1981?

The PRESIDENT: Would you like to have a Spanish translation of this question?

Commander CARRIÓN: No, I think I understand. Well, the date of late December 1981 refers to the first time we have evidence of a direct CIA involvement with the contras. That does not mean that the CIA or other United States Government agencies were not having any activities against my Government prior to that date, but as far as we are concerned (as far as we can say with any certainty) the direct involvement with the armed groups (let us put it that way) began at the end of 1981. That is all I have to say.

The PRESIDENT: Judge Schwebel would like to put his question now.

Judge SCHWEBEL: Mr. President, I have three series of questions I should like to ask of Commander Carrión. Commander Carrión: Let us go back please to the days when the revolution against the Somoza Government was in progress but when the Somoza Government was still in power.

1. My first question is: would you be good enough briefly to describe the part you played in the revolution?

Commander CARRIÓN: I came to the FSLN, which is the leading political party in Nicaragua and the one which led the revolution, in 1972. From then on I worked as an organiser of the rank and file of the FSLN in the city of Managua mainly where I stayed most of my militant life as a member of the FSLN party. My organizational activities were related to forming FSLN groups within various sectors of the population; we used to work with the industrial workers in the city of Managua and also within the vicinity. We did two types of thing — we helped them to set up their own organizations, for instance we helped them to organize the labour unions and most of the Nicaraguan workers at that time did not have any organized work because of the ferocious repression that Somoza maintained against the workers. You might say that some of the popular organizations that presently exist in Nicaragua were born before the revolution because they were organizations that dealt with the immediate interests of the people and simultaneously with that we tried to form (or I tried to form with other members of my party), FSLN groups where we could, to make our political programme known to more and more people all over the country so that they would support it. We also started organizing activities again against Somoza's Government; this happened because there was no other way in Nicaragua at that time to change the government. The Somoza dictatorship lasted more than 45 years, from the father Somoza to sons who inherited political power from him and this military action against the Somoza National Guard and Somoza's dictatorship started to gain support from the people until an insurrection occurred first in September 1978; people took to the streets with every object that could be considered a weapon to fight the Somoza army. The insurrection was defeated at that time but then another insurrection came by June of 1979 when people took to the streets again in practically all cities and main rural areas of the country. By this time, Somoza's army could not resist; Somoza fled the country and the whole structure fell apart, then the FSLN took over political power.

Q.: Thank you. My second question is: during the revolution, but before the overthrow of the Somoza Government, did Sandinista forces receive assistance from foreign States?

A.: We received some support from other States.

Q.: Did such support include any or all of the following:
Were arms supplied by any foreign States to the Sandinista forces?

A.: We received a small amount of weapons from other States, but we also got weapons by taking them from the Somoza army and by buying from the clandestine weapons market.

Q.: Did the Sandinista forces have the benefit of the use of bases in foreign territory, as for example Costa Rica?

A.: Not exactly, the great majority of the Sandinista forces always remained within Nicaraguan territory and the revolutionary process came into existence through two insurrections from within the country and especially from within the cities, by the people who were there and had been fighting there for a long time. I can say, however, that we were not being put under pressure from the Government of Costa Rica, and we could stay there for some short periods of time.

Q.: Did such foreign assistance include the training of Sandinista fighters?

A.: A very small part of the people who took part in the revolution received some training offered by other States.

Q.: Would you please name those States?

A.: Yes, we received training in Cuba.

Q.: Was there participation of foreign volunteer forces in the Sandinista forces or did such foreign soldiers, for example Panamanian soldiers, conduct allied operations with them?

A.: There were some non-Nicaraguans with the FSLN forces.

Q.: Thank you very much. May I now turn to my second series of questions and to the period since the revolution has been in power. You indicated Commander, your official responsibilities, particularly in Nicaragua's northern regions. I wish to ask:
Are you aware of any shipment of arms since the coming to power of the revolution in July 1979 from the territory of Nicaragua to insurgents in El Salvador?

A.: My Government has never had a policy of sending arms to opposition forces in Central America. That does not mean that this did not happen, especially in the first years after the revolution in 1979 and 1980, weapons might have been carried through Nicaraguan territory, weapons that might have the Savadoran insurgents, as you said, as their final recipient. As a matter of fact in those first years there were several Nicaraguan citizens who went by themselves to El Salvador to join the Salvadoran revolutionaries there because they felt it was a fight like ours. Our fight was very recent and many people were willing to go down to El Salvador and help in their fight. But this was never an official policy and many of them could have been stopped before they left Nicaragua because most of the time they did this illegally. At one time we caught a "tica-bus" which is a commercial passenger bus line which travels through Central America. We caught this bus which had a double bottom and that double bottom contained arms, weapons, and those were going to El Salvador. So we suppose that there might have been other loads of arms going through Nicaragua that we did not catch.

Q.: My final series of questions is this, and it complements the line of questioning of the President. You stated yesterday, in respect of the training of the contras, "In 1982 up to the beginning of 1984, the main part of the training was given by Argentine mercenaries hired by the CIA for which they received a monetary payment."

Nicaragua has introduced, as Annex F, Number 191, to its Memorial, as evidence, an article from the Wall Street Journal of 5 March 1985, which states the following:

> "The program got off to a bad start when the CIA turned to a surrogate, the right wing military dictatorship in Argentina, to organize and train the Contras. The Argentines already had a small training program for the Contras in Honduras and by working with them the U.S. shielded its own involvement. But the heavyhanded Argentine approach tainted the movement in the eyes of many Nicaraguans. The U.S. had few alternatives, since the CIA at the time didn't have any reliable paramilitary capability of its own."

The article in the Wall Street Journal further states that,

> "The Argentines also apparently tolerated a practice of killing prisoners . . . (To stop the killing, CIA-officers ordered in mid-1982 that all prisoners be brought back to base for interrogation.)"

The impression given by this evidence introduced by Nicaragua is

(a) that the first Government to assist the contras was not that of the United States but that of the then Government of Argentina;
(b) that the Argentine Government provided personnel from its armed forces to train the contras; and
(c) that the Argentine advisers tolerated a practice of killing prisoners which, when CIA advisers came on the scene, they endeavoured to stop.

Would you please comment on the foregoing impressions and also on whether a characterization of Argentine personnel, provided by the then existing Argentine Government for training of the contras, can correctly be characterized as "mercenaries"?

Commander CARRIÓN: First of all, I believe that the newspaper article you have just read expresses the writer's point of view. You did not say if those assertions were direct quotations from CIA officers or CIA chiefs, so what I think the article makes evident is that there was an involvement of Argentinians, that there was an involvement of the United States in co-operation — in close relationships — with some Argentinian people. Whenever we turned to the Argentinian Government to ask them about these people, they presented us with documents of their formal discharge from the army — the Argentinian army. So, we are not in a position to assert that in the participation of these Argentinian ex-military it was a governmental decision on the part of the Argentinian Government at that time. We know that some talks were held by United States officers — among some United States officers — and some military of the Argentinian army. That is as far as we know. This means that the first foreign involvement with the contras already relied upon the participation of the United States of America and it is very clear that they took the initiative to involve people from other nationalities — that is in reply to your question as to whether another government was the first to get involved with the contras.

Would you please repeat the other two questions?

Judge SCHWEBEL: My second impression, on which I invited your comment, was that the Argentine Government had provided personnel from its armed forces to train the contras; I think actually you have responded to that. The third was that, according to this article introduced in an annex to the Nicaraguan Memorial, Argentine advisers tolerated the practice of killing prisoners which the CIA endeavoured to stop.

Commander CARRIÓN: I think that it was very clear yesterday how a CIA document, which is the Psychological Operations in Guerrilla Warfare manual, clearly instructs the contras in killing some civilian people. They list some of them and leave it open with an etcetera at the end of the list for the contras to decide who would be victims of these murders, so I believe that in the essence of the terrorist tactics of the contras there was not any variation when the Argentinians were the major trainers but not the sole trainers and when the CIA directly took over the training. I have to say that from the beginning, from 1981 up to now, the CIA has held firmly in its hand the direction and control of all contra operations. So they have been directly involved at all stages of the organizational process of the contras and they directly hold responsibility for things the contras are doing.

Judge SCHWEBEL: I have completed my questions. I think you earlier responded to my last one about whether the Argentine officers could correctly be characterized as mercenaries.

The PRESIDENT: May I now have Sir Robert Jennings please?

Judge Sir Robert JENNINGS: One very short question on the minings of the ports. Presumably after the mining it was necessary to sweep the mines or deal with the mines in some other way and I remember at the time there was even talk of an international operation to do that. In the event, was the Nicaraguan Government able to deal with the mines from its own resources and can you tell us roughly what time elapsed between the discovery of the mines and the restoration of the ports to normal use by shipping?

Commander CARRIÓN: Nicaragua could not deal with the mines with its own resources. We do not have a mine-searching ship of any kind. We even had to try to sweep the mines away with a fishing boat and a net hanging down and going over the channel in order to try to sweep them away. As you may suppose this was a very ineffective way of dealing with underwater mines that were the ones that the CIA had put there.

In relation to your second question, we never discovered a mine before it exploded. We did not have the means to discover them, so during the whole period when our ports were mined, there was an abnormal situation in Nicaraguan ports. Every vessel that came to our ports could be hit at any moment by an underwater mine so we could talk about a permanent state of abnormality for several months during which our ports were mined.

Judge Sir Robert JENNINGS: Still, could you tell us roughly how long — days, weeks — this situation obtained, because presumably this is all right now. Presumably the mines are not operating at the moment and I would like to know about how long this situation that you have just described lasted?

Commander CARRIÓN: When a mine exploded normal operations in the port would be stopped for between two and three days and then resume, not in a normal way, but trying to look normal. Concerning how long a period the mines were being put in our ports — it was approximately two months.

The PRESIDENT: May I now ask Mr. Colliard to put his question please.

M. COLLIARD: Monsieur le Vice-Ministre, j'aurais trois questions à vous poser. Peut-être, pour certaines d'entre elles, ne pourrez-vous pas répondre immédiatement et, avec la permission du Président, je suis prêt à recevoir vos réponses la semaine prochaine, dans un délai que pourrait fixer le Président.

Première question. Des indications ont-elles été fournies par l'examen des mines repêchées concernant leur fabrication et leur provenance?

Commander CARRIÓN: As I said before, the Nicaraguan Government had no possibility of discovering the mines before they exploded, much less capturing them. So we did not actually see a mine, we did not have any in our hands and in any case the origin of the manufacture of the weapons or other military explosive devices that are used by intelligence agencies does not mean anything because the first thing that an intelligence agency would do is to acquire the equipment in some place other than in its own country. This is why it is very significant that in the case of Nicaragua the CIA has not taken any care, in many cases, to cover up the origin of most of the equipment they used.

M. COLLIARD: La seconde question est la suivante. Hier, parlant de navire endommagé par des mines, vous avez indiqué quatorze personnes blessées et deux tuées. Pouvez-vous préciser à bord de quel navire ces accidents ont eu lieu?

Commander CARRIÓN: Yes, I have that information here. The two killed were Nicaraguan and it happened when a mine blew up a fishing boat Pesaca No. 22. Also, three people were wounded at that time in that same boat. From the Soviet vessel five members of the crew were wounded, from the Panamanian vessel there were three crew members wounded and there were three Nicaraguans wounded in another ship, which makes up a total of 14 wounded people as I mentioned yesterday.

M. COLLIARD: Enfin, troisième question. S'agissant de navires étrangers, autres que navires du Nicaragua, pourrait-on avoir le nom des compagnies auxquelles appartenaient les navires endommagés. La réponse peut être différée parce que vous n'avez peut-être pas les éléments ici même.

Commander CARRIÓN: I do not have that information with me. I would have to ask for it so I could not answer immediately.

The PRESIDENT: Would you then be able to answer in about a week's time?

Commander CARRIÓN: In a week's time? Yes, I could.

The PRESIDENT: Very well, then do so please.

The Court adjourned from 11.25 a.m. to 11.54 a.m.

The PRESIDENT: There is one more question for the first witness, if Commander Carrión is still available.

Mr. ARGÜELLO GÓMEZ: Mr. President, Commander Carrión has already left. When we were told that he might be needed again he had already left the premises, but certainly if the Registry would like to locate him, I should imagine that he has returned to his hotel. Otherwise he could be called after the witness we are going to introduce next, by which time we could probably have him back here.

The PRESIDENT: Very well.

Mr. ARGÜELLO GÓMEZ: In that case, Mr. President, I request the Court to call our next witness, Mr. David MacMichael, who will be examined by Professor Chayes.

The PRESIDENT: I would first ask the Judge to put his question, to get it on record, and when the Commander comes he can answer it. If not, he will answer it subsequently. I will summon the second witness after Judge Schwebel has taken the floor.

Judge SCHWEBEL: May I submit, Mr. President, that since it is believed that Commander Carrión can return, it would save the time of the Court if I simply stated the question when he appears.

EVIDENCE OF MR. MacMICHAEL

WITNESS CALLED BY THE GOVERNMENT OF NICARAGUA

Professor CHAYES: Before the witness makes his solemn declaration I would like to make a statement for him and for the Court. Mr. MacMichael at the outset and before you have made your solemn declaration, I want to admonish you and assure the Court that in the testimony you are about to give you will not make any unauthorized disclosure of information that is classified under United States security procedures, nor disclose any information in violation of any laws or regulations of the United States or of the terms of any employment contract you may have with any agency of the United States Government. If I ask you a question that you cannot answer truthfully under those limitations, you should simply say "I cannot answer that question". Do you understand that?

Mr. MacMICHAEL: Yes. I do.

Professor CHAYES: And do you agree to comply with those limitations to the best of your knowledge and ability?

Mr. MacMICHAEL: I do agree.

Professor CHAYES: Would you now make the solemn declaration.

Mr. MacMICHAEL: I solemnly declare, upon my honour and conscience, that I will speak the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth.

Q.: Please state your full name and current address for the record.

A.: My name is David MacMichael. My current address is 11442 Orchard Lane, Reston, Virginia, United States.

Q.: When and where were you born?

A.: I was born on 5 June 1928 in Albany, New York.

Q.: And what is your current employment?

A.: Currently I am a senior associate with the Council on Hemispheric Affairs in Washington, D.C.

Q.: I am now going to develop in some detail those aspects of Mr. MacMichael's background and experience that bear on his qualifications as an expert witness in the field of intelligence analysis, guerrilla warfare and counter-insurgency, with specific reference to Latin America and Central America.

Mr. MacMichael, please summarizé your educational background.

A.: I hold a Bachelor's Degree in Liberal Arts from Hampden-Sidney College in Virginia and a Master's Degree and a Doctor of Philosophy in History from the University of Oregon.

Q.: Could you summarize your military experience, please?

I was an infantry officer: I performed duties typically in amphibious reconnaissance and infantry assignments, and I was wounded in action in Korea.

Q.: What did you do after you finished your graduate studies?

A.: I taught history at the Dominican College of San Raphael in California and at the University of Oregon.

Q.: What course did you teach?

A.: Primarily I taught Latin American history and courses in American history.

A.: Yes, I was. My dissertation topic dealt with United States relations with the Dominican Republic and on Caribbean diplomacy.

Q.: So what did you do after 1965?

A.: In 1965 I was invited to join the Stanford Research Institute, now known as SRI International, in Menlo Park, California.

Q.: What kind of organization was it?

It does contract research for a variety of governmental and private clients in a whole range of fields from hard science to social science studies.

Q.: And what kinds of contracts did you work on?

A.: I was employed originally to work on Department of Defense contracts, first in Central and South America.

Q.: Could you describe in general the kind of study that you were working on? By that I mean the subject-matter, the kinds of data that you developed, and so on.

A.: The initial study that I dealt with was one contracted with the Advanced Research Projects Agency of the Department of Defense of the United States. It was directed at the military assistance programme in Latin America which at that time was being revised from previous concentration on external defence towards internal security matters and it was one of a series of studies designed to assist the Department of Defense in reshaping its military assistance programmes on that basis.

Q.: Can you say what countries your study dealt with?

A.: Yes, the two countries which we studied were Honduras and Peru.

Q.: And how did you go about this study?

A.: A team was formed at SRI consisting of myself, a retired United States Army colonel who was chief of the team, and a former relatively high-ranking Central Intelligence Agency official who was then an employee of SRI and some supporting personnel. We did some background within the area dealing with outside consultants, experts from the Stanford community. We travelled to Panama to the Southern Command Headquarters, where we conferred with the officers in charge of the military assistance programme, examined their files, travelled to the countries in question, dealt there with United States advisory personnel, with local military and internal security personnel, discussing the general problem, and on the basis of several months of this activity produced a report.

Q.: I have been informed that both of us are speaking a little too fast for the interpreters to follow so let us both try to do better on the subsequent questions. To resume our consideration of these studies, in the course of this work did you have access to classified information?

A.: Yes, I did.

Q.: And to what degree of classification?

A.: At that time I had clearance for secret material.

Q.: Sir, you said that at the end of the study your team prepared a written report; when was that?

A.: That was in February 1966.

Q.: To whom was that report transmitted?

A.: To the contractor, the Advanced Research Projects Agency.

Q.: Did the report receive other distribution, so far as you know, within the Defense Department or other government departments and agencies?

A.: Yes, it was rather widely distributed; we received comments from a number of United States government agencies on that report.

Q.: Was the report itself classified?

A.: Yes, it was.

Q.: As I said before, I do not want to ask you to reveal classified information, but within that limitation could you summarize in any way the recommendations of the report?

A.: Yes, I think that in general the report provided the Department of Defense with what we thought were the critical features of the internal security situation within each country, addressed ourselves to the posture and organization of the internal security forces of each country and in light of the situation as we had defined it, made certain recommendations as to procedures the Department of Defense might follow in its military assistance programmes thereafter.

Q.: Now sometime later you joined the Office of the Special Assistant for counter-insurgency in the United States Mission in Bangkok in Thailand. Could you please state the circumstances under which that occurred?

A.: Yes. Following the completion of the study we have discussed, I was invited to join the SRI (the Stanford Research Team) that was then working under contract, again with the Advanced Research Projects Agency of the Department of Defense, in Bangkok, Thailand. My initial tasks there were to conduct studies on the Thai-Malayan border with a view to determining whether certain internal security devices and programmes that had been used by the United Kingdom in Malaysia — a closely related area — would be suitable for implementation in that area. While I was engaged in that, after having been in Thailand for some months the United States Government, which was at that time funding and supporting a great number of internal security activities within Thailand and assistance to the Royal Thai Government being carried out by a large number of United States Government agencies, found it necessary better to co-ordinate those activities and established within the United States Embassy an office to do that which was called the Special Assistant for counter-insurgency. A senior United States intelligence officer was assigned to head that office, and as I mentioned earlier in my work on Central and South America our team had included a former CIA officer who recommended me to this Special Assistant as someone who could give him qualified assistance in that office and he asked me to join the office; the SRI contract with the Department of Defense was arranged so that my services could be employed in that office within the United States Embassy.

Q.: When you joined that office was your status as employee of the SRI or of the United States Government?

A.: I remained an employee of SRI.

Q.: What was your relationship to the office?

A.: I was one of about half a dozen staff members in the office, this included representatives from the Agency for International Development, from the Intelligence Agency, from the United States Information Agency, from the Department of Defense — with a military representative as well — and our task as a staff was to assist the Special Assistant in, as I said, co-ordinating the activities of these various United States Government Agencies.

Q.: And you were a full-time member of that staff?

A.: That was my full-time employment for almost two years, yes.

Q.: Now could you describe some of the subjects of study that you worked on when you were attached to the staff of that office?

A.: One of the principal tasks, aside from the administrative functions of co-ordination of the activities of other agencies, was to study the nature of the internal security situation within Thailand at that time — a rather vexed question if I may say so — to determine whether these several programmes of the United States Government were being most effective and directed towards the actual situation.

Q.: And did you concentrate your study in any particular areas of Thailand?

A.: The principal area of concern at that time was the northeastern part of Thailand where the largest and supposedly most critical of the several insurgencies was then raging.

Q.: And in relation to that insurgency in northeast Thailand what parts of the counter-insurgency programme were you specifically concerned with?

A.: The specific concern assigned to me was the extent to which this insurgency was purely indigenous and the extent to which it was being directed and supported from outside the country. This obviously was a matter of concern in terms of how one organized a system for dealing with insurgency.

Q.: And how did you obtain the data for that study?

A.: This involved a study of the existing intelligence files on the subject, consultations with both United States Government and Royal Thai Government personnel who were dealing with the subject; field trips, organization of certain technical aspects, that is to monitor and report on, for example, alleged air intrusion into Thailand and general matters of that type.

Q.: And did this information include classified materials?

A.: Almost all the material was classified, yes.

Q.: And, what were you seeking to determine — if you can describe that in a few sentences?

A.: To ascertain the extent to which the problem was an indigenous one or one that relied essentially on import of arms and trained personnel from outside the country; in this case the concern was with North Vietnam.

Q.: And for that purpose did you have to identify and define the supply network and logistic system of the insurgents?

A.: Yes, we attempted to do that.

Q.: Now, to whom did you report?

A.: Well, the report was given directly to my superior, the Special Assistant for counter-insurgency.

Q.: And was that report classified?

A.: Yes, it was.

Q.: Did the reports circulate back in Washington?

A.: Yes, it formed a basis for a very long cable, which was transmitted to the Secretary of State, making certain recommendations about the nature of the northeastern insurgency and the manner in which the United States should organize its programmes of support for the Royal Thai Government.

Q.: Having regard to the restriction already mentioned about revealing classified information, could you summarize the conclusions of this final report?

A.: With regard to its central matter, the basic conclusion was that this was very largely an indigenous matter that received some, but not critical, support in the form of training and supplies from outside the country.

Q.: Did your recommendations or analysis become the basis for, or influence, United States policy in this area?

A.: I believe that they did.

Q.: Now is there any other particular area in Thailand that became a subject of your concern?

A.: I carried out several studies for which I was directly responsible to that office and later to the Ambassador, dealing with, once again, the Thai-Malaysian border area; I also conducted a study for the Ambassador of the United States programme for providing certain types of aircraft to the Thai security forces, with a view to their suitability, or the suitability of the programme, for the overall effort. I also assisted SRI again in one of its major projects, which was a surveillance system along the Mekong River.

Q.: Looking for a moment to the Thai-Malaysian border insurgency problem, could you describe that work more fully?

A.: Well, to a certain extent, as I have already explained, an early project for SRI there was to examine very closely — and this was a very detailed study, it attempted to find the supply and support system for the nearly 2,000 guerrillas, these were people essentially left over from the so-called Malayan emergency — to determine how they supported themselves in the jungle areas and to assist the Royal Thai Government and co-operating Malaysian forces in devising a system to disrupt and interrupt that supply system. I also later carried out more general studies with regard to the overall social and economic system in which these people existed.

Q.: Now you said that after you concluded your work in the office of the Special Assistant for counter-insurgency, you did some work directly for the Ambassador. Who was the Ambassador at that time — that is the United States Ambassador, I assume?

A.: At that time it was Mr. Leonard Unger.

Q.: And in this capacity, were you still paid by the SRI?

A.: Yes, I was.

Q.: You have already given us the main subjects of those studies, perhaps you could recapitulate very briefly?

A.: The two — as I say I performed at his direction — included the examination of the social and economic system or circumstances, conditions along the Thai-Malaysian border and the second, which was more highly focussed because the question had become an important one, had to do with the United States programme for providing aircraft for use in Thai counter-insurgent operations.

Q.: When did you leave Thailand?

A.: I left in August of 1969.

Q.: And did you continue for SRI?

A.: Yes, I did, until the end of 1976.

Q.: What kinds of projects did you work on during that period?

A.: On my return to the United States I began to work on projects; I did several for the law enforcement assistance administration of the Justice Department and then joined a group that was under contract to the then Office of Education, later the Department of Education in the United States Government.

Q.: Was there any particular reason why you stopped working on defence-related studies at this time?

A.: In the years around 1970 and after that the interests of the United States Government, which had been the primary funder for the studies I had performed previously, began to shift away from the type of counter-insurgency and defence-related study. To put it frankly, there were fewer contracts coming to SRI in that field and in order to remain employed I shifted over to other work.

Q.: You left SRI you said in 1976?

A.: Yes, I did.

Q.: What did you do then?

A.: I went to work as a private consultant.

Q.: When you were working as a private consultant, did you work on any projects for the United States Government in the political, military area?

A.: Yes, I did.

Q.: Could you describe the project that you worked on?

A.: That particular project I cannot describe.

Q.: All right. Now, after some time as a private consultant, you were employed by the CIA — is that correct?

A.: That is correct.

Q.: State the dates during which you were so employed.

A.: I went on active duty with the Central Intelligence Agency on 6 March 1981 and left them on — I believe the date was 3 April 1983.

Q.: Could you state the nature of the employment relationship between you and the Agency?

A.: Yes, I entered as a full-time, fully integrated employee of the Central Intelligence Agency. I was cleared in the manner of a full-time employee, I went through the same security procedures, the same required polygraph examinations, was integrated into the retirement system, but I was in on a two-year contract.

Q.: Tell us the exact title of your position with the Agency.

A.: I was designated a Senior Estimates Officer with the Analytic Group of the National Intelligence Council.

Q.: I would like to break down that impressive title a little bit. First, what is the National Intelligence Council, and what are its functions?

A.: The National Intelligence Council is the senior staff of the Central Intelligence Agency, it works directly under and in support of the Director, it is not a part of the two main divisions of the Central Intelligence Agency. It is composed of a group of senior officials who are designated as National Intelligence officers, who work under a chairman of the National Intelligence Council. Each one of the National Intelligence officers has assigned to him an assistant National Intelligence officer. The main function of the National Intelligence Council is to serve as a senior advisory body to the Director of Intelligence, its most critical function is defined as the warning function — that is, it is supposed to report immediately to the Director any developments globally that could seriously and adversely affect the interests of the United States. The National Intelligence officers in their individual capacity have responsibility for regional or functional areas within the world — that is to say, there will be a National Intelligence officer, say, for Latin American affairs. Functionally there would be a National Intelligence officer for world economic affairs. In their individual capacities these National Intelligence officers are charged with co-ordinating the activities, in their areas of responsibility, of the whole intelligence community of the United States, that is, all the agencies which have intelligence responsibilities in these areas.

Q.: Are all of these members of the National Intelligence Council CIA officers?

A.: No. They are drawn from within the intelligence community. I should mention there is also a senior advisory group of retired and distinguished officials attached to this, who are brought back to serve as a more or less in-house Board of Directors.

Q.: Can you name any of these National Intelligence officers?

A.: No. I cannot name anyone with whom I worked in the Central Intelligence Agency.

Q.: What are the principal reports and analyses that the Council is responsible for?

A.: The Council is responsible for the preparation of inter-agency intelligence documents and these have three principal forms, one is entitled the "National Intelligence Estimate", these are broad general purpose documents prepared either periodically or at the pleasure and direction of the Director of Intelligence to serve as the basic information papers on a region, or a country, or a functional area, for the use of decision-makers within the United States Government, within the context and with relation to the United States policy in those areas; the second type of document prepared, for which this group is responsible, are special National Intelligence Estimates, which are similar in purpose and form but generally shorter and directed towards a more immediate problem or to a region which has suddenly become of more interest and concern to the United States.

Q.: Are those special National Intelligence Estimates performed by special commissions so to speak?

A.: These estimates are essentially drawn up in the following manner: the National Intelligence officer responsible calls a meeting of interested involved agencies within the intelligence community to determine the general focus and scope of such a special estimate or a National Intelligence Estimate, there will be general agreement on terms of reference for the paper and usually a drafter will be selected. At a later meeting the drafter will present the terms of reference, the general scope and outline of the study, a schedule will be decided upon, the drafter will set to work and meet periodically with representatives of the interested agencies and eventually a paper is produced.

Q.: We have been talking so far about the National Intelligence Council, I now want to turn to the Analytic Group. That is the Group of which you were a member. What is the nature and function of that Group, who are its members, how large is it, please provide information of that kind?

A.: The Analytic Group was formed around 1979 or 1980 to meet a long-felt need of the National Intelligence Council to have an immediate body of qualified persons responsible to it, to conduct analyses, to advise it and to serve as drafters of estimates and other inter-agency papers. The Group was composed of members drawn from throughout the intelligence community and a few people like myself taken from academia, research institutions and so forth from outside. One of the basic principles upon which this Group was founded was to provide the Intelligence Council with fresh new points, not tied to any demands of any specific agency. Its members only serve with the Council for two years and then they returned to where they had come from.

Q.: What are the duties of a Senior Estimates Officer in the Analytic Group?

A.: The Estimates Officers — there is no real rank or gradation, I may say — as a Senior Estimates Officer one was responsible for carrying out studies and analyses, drafting papers at the direction of the National Intelligence Council. Members were also expected to carry out independent research tests of their own and report on these to the Chairman of the National Intelligence Council.

Q.: In your capacity as Senior Estimates Officer did you attend regularly scheduled meetings of boards or committees within the agency or constituted on an inter-agency basis?

A.: Yes, I did. We had regular weekly meetings as part of the National Intelligence Council in a body with the Chairman. The Analytic Group met separately with the Chairman on a weekly basis. As a representative of the Analytic Group I attended meetings of interest to the Group and myself personally throughout the Central Intelligence Agency and other Agencies as well.

Q.: To whom did you report?

A.: We had a National Intelligence Officer at large, a senior official who was generally responsible for the functioning of our Group. Technically we reported directly to the Chairman of the National Intelligence Council.

Q.: When you were called upon to prepare or review an intelligence paper what did you do to prepare yourself for that task?

A.: The hope was that one was generally qualified to do this initially, but immediately the process of what was called reading into the problem began, one would examine the existing files on the topic, would confer with the analyst and other persons within the intelligence community who had special knowledge of that problem, and would, through the system, call up current intelligence material to gain further knowledge on it.

Q.: And did this involve the review of classified intelligence information?

A.: Yes, it did.

Q.: Can you tell us the precise type of clearance that you had at this time?

A.: I had a top secret clearance with an additional type of clearance which enabled me to go out of the boundaries of what is known as "special compartmented intelligence". Due to the global nature of the duties of the National Intelligence Council its members were not confined to a narrow need to know an area in one special function or region.

Q.: And is top secret the highest form of clearance category in the United States classification system?

A.: Formally[1], yes.

Q.: Now I want to take you back to the time when you joined the agency in 1981 and I want to ask you whether, as a Senior Estimates Officer with the Analytic Group of the National Intelligence Council, your work was concentrated in any one area?

[1] See p. 59, infra. [Note by the Registry.]

A.: Technically, I and the other members of the group were in general support to the National Intelligence Council. In practice, we found ourselves as individual members concentrating on one area in which we had more expertise. In my case, I spent the vast majority of my time working on inter-American, that is western hemisphere, affairs.

Q.: Now, as part of your official duties at that time in 1981, were you advised of a plan prepared for submission to the President of the United States calling for covert activities against Nicaragua?

A.: Yes, I was.

Q.: Can you tell us when and how you were advised of the plan?

A.: The plan was discussed at a meeeting of the Latin American Affairs Office which I attended in my capacity as a member of the analytic group early in the Fall of 1981.

Q.: When you say Latin American Affairs Office, is that the Latin American Affairs Office of the Central Intelligence Agency?

A.: Yes, it is.

Q.: Do you know if the President ultimately approved this plan?

A.: Yes, he did.

Q.: Was that the plan submitted to the House and Senate Intelligence Committees in November 1981?

A.: Yes, it was.

Q.: You say you first heard of this plan at a meeting in the Latin American Affairs Office of the Agency in the Fall of 1981, could you tell us generally the outline of the plan as discussed in that meeting?

A.: Well, as discussed, the general premise of the plan was that Nicaragua was considered a menace to the security of the Central American region and that a covert force of approximately 1,500 men was to be organized to carry out military and paramilitary actions in Nicaragua.

Q.: Now at that meeting, was the possible response of the Government of Nicaragua to these military and paramilitary activities considered?

A.: Yes, it was.

Q.: Could you say what responses were anticipated?

A.: In general the appreciation at that time was that the Nicaraguan Government leadership was immature, impulsive, possessed, in the phrase used, of a "guerrilla" mentality and it was presumed that in response to the actions of this covert force that in all likelihood the Nicaraguan Government would engage in hot pursuit of this covert paramilitary force, across international boundaries within Central America, it was assumed that in response to the state of emergency generated by these attacks that the Nicaraguan Government would clamp down and eliminate civil liberties, to exile or confine its political opponents, and finally that diplomatic relations between the United States and Nicaragua probably would be exacerbated and that United States diplomatic personnel within Nicaragua could expect to be harassed or otherwise restricted or affected.

Q.: Now, what was the attitude within this Committee to these anticipated responses?

A.: I do not know exactly how to respond in terms of attitude. Certainly this was put forward as a programme which would destabilize or certainly reduce the presumed menace that the Nicaraguan Government presented to the region.

Q.: Why, for example, was it expected that if Nicaragua took actions in hot pursuit of this paramilitary force across international boundaries, why was that a development that the group looked forward to?

A.: It would serve to demonstrate what was believed, which was that the Nicaraguan Government was inherently aggressive and a danger to its neighbours in the region and that such crossing of territorial boundaries would demonstrate this and possibly allow for the use of sanctions or other actions under the Organization of American States' Charter.

Q.: And why did the group anticipate or look forward to the further repressive activities by the Nicaraguan Government?

A.: It was assumed that the Nicaraguan Government was inherently totalitarian and repressive and that it had rather successfully portrayed itself as an open and democratic society and thus gained a good deal of support in world public opinion and that by causing its true nature as a repressive and totalitarian government to be displayed it would lose this support.

Q.: Why did they look forward to the possibility that Nicaragua would take harsh action against United States diplomats?

A.: I think the purpose here was to be able to demonstrate the essential hostility of the Nicaraguan Government toward the United States and thus help to justify in United States public opinion actions which the United States might take against Nicaragua.

Q.: What would you say was the overall purpose of the plan?

The PRESIDENT: Would this be a convenient place to stop and have Commander Carrión, the first witness, answer the question posed to him earlier?

Professor CHAYES: Yes, this would be perfectly all right. I think Mr. MacMichael ought to retire at this point so that he does not hear Commander Carrión's answer, but this would be a perfectly appropriate time to do that.

QUESTIONS PUT TO COMMANDER CARRIÓN BY JUDGE SCHWEBEL

Judge SCHWEBEL: Commander, I regret the inconvenience of your being recalled. I have two questions following from your earlier testimony.

First, what would you estimate was approximately the total of the armed strength of the Sandinista fighting forces by about June 1979 shortly before Somoza's collapse? I ask for just a rough estimate, not a precise figure.

Commander CARRIÓN: The Sandinista forces by the end of 1979 — the Sandinista armed forces — were somewhere in between 3,000 and 4,000 armed men. There was a much greater number of Sandinista sympathizers, but the armed men were around 3,000 or a little bit more.

Q.: Thank you. My second question is this: you stated in response to the questions I put to you earlier that the amount of arms furnished by foreign States to Sandinista forces was small — that I believe is the word you used, small — and you have responded to my question about the use of foreign bases by Sandinista forces in terms which I believe gave the impression that such foreign basing was not very important to the cause of the Sandinista revolution, if I understood you correctly. Is my recollection of your answers correct?

A.: Yes, but I think that concerning the arms question I said that a part of the arms were provided by some other States.

Q.: Yes. Now, if you will permit me and if the Court will permit me, I am going to read a few excerpts from a book, Nicaraguan Revolution in the Family, by Shirley Christian, a Pulitzer prize-winning journalist, now a reporter for The New York Times. It is a detailed eye-witness account of the fall of Somoza, among other things.

First quotation:

> ". . . the rebel supply-line was growing and becoming more efficient. From December 1978 to July 1979 there were at least 60 flights into Costa Rica with arms, ammunition and other war supplies. This was confirmed . . . by the subsequent investigation conducted by the Costa Rican National Assembly. Except for the flights that brought the Venezuelan offering and one carried items supplied by Panama, . . . all the flights carried material supplied by Cuba . . ." (At p. 90.)

Second quotation:

> "In addition to the preparations in Costa Rica, a smaller number of Sandinistas was organizing and arming in Honduras in early 1979 to push into Nicaragua from the north." (At p. 91.)

Third quotation:

> "In Costa Rica an estimated 1,500 men and women were preparing for an all-out invasion of their homeland."

Fourth quotation:

> "As the time for the southern offensive, planned for late May, grew close, it was decided to eliminate the Panamanian town . . . as the transshipment point for weapons and ammunition. Instead, everything would be flown direct from Cuba to Costa Rica . . ." (At p. 95.)

Fifth quotation:

"To make the flights direct from Cuba to Costa Rica, Edén Pastora struck a deal with Costa Rica . . . The airport manager . . . calculated there were 23 flights to and from Cuba between then and the end of the war in mid-July . . . Costa Rican National Assembly investigators later estimated that at least one million pounds of war material entered Costa Rica from Cuba during that period of six to eight weeks, a figure that did not include what had been shipped earlier . . ." (At p. 96.)

Now, in the light of this data, Commander, would you please amplify your earlier statement or inference that provision of arms by foreign States to Sandinista forces was "small", and that the reliance on foreign bases of more than 1,500 of the 3,000 or 4,000 of the Sandinista armed forces' bases in Costa Rica and Honduras was not important?

A.: Yes. I said that weapons received at that time from other States were a part of the total weapons the Sandinistas used at that time. I would like to remind the Court that the Sandinistas were fighting against Somoza since 1963 — I mean involved in military action against Somoza's dictatorship — and the quotes you just read from that book refer to some assistance received beginning, I believe, at the end of 1978. I can assure you that during all that time practically all weapons that the Sandinistas used and a part of the weapons that the Sandinistas used after the end of 1978 were bought in the clandestine weapons market. I was personally involved in purchasing $500,000 worth of arms from European suppliers. I know that there were other purchases like that, and we also received weapons and assistance from other States, as it is put there. I am not in a position to confirm the figures mentioned by Miss Christian in the book, because I was not, except for a very short period of time, in Costa Rica or Honduras at that time.

Secondly, I believe that there were not somewhere close to 1,200, as you said?

Q.: Miss Christian says there were 1,500 Sandinistas in Costa Rica.

A.: I do not believe the figure was so large. As far as I know, it was somewhere around 800 to 1,000 men and women, and I am not sure if all of them were directly involved in combat actions. Nevertheless this does not affect the judgment I made and the fact that people coming from outside had a very minor effect on the outcome of the war. I would like to mention that in a period of a few days, that is three to four days, the Sandinistas forces were holding combat in practically every major city of the country and that could only be achieved by forces that were already in the cities or very near the cities, and I am talking first of all about the city of Managua, which is the capital, Léon, Masaya, Juigalpa, Matagalpa, Esteli, which I believe were the main cities at that moment attacked by Sandinista forces, and the forces attacking these cities constituted the greatest part of the Sandinista forces acting at that time. But not only that, also the Sandinista forces acting within the cities, the armed forces, were not so large, because we had a shortage of weapons. But what made it possible for them to achieve a victory was the fact that practically the great majority of the population in different ways insurrected to support the relatively small armed Sandinista groups that were acting within the cities. This is clearly, and this is a historical fact, by large the most important factor towards the overthrowing of the Somoza dictatorship. That is all I have to say.

The Court rose at 1 p.m.

The PRESIDENT: Before proceeding with the hearing I have to announce that Judge Lachs, for reasons which he has disclosed to me, is unable to be present this afternoon.

You may now resume the testimony of Mr. MacMichael, the second witness. I give the floor to the counsel for Nicaragua, Professor Chayes.

Professor CHAYES: Mr. MacMichael, before we proceed may I remind you that at the beginning of your testimony you made a solemn declaration, upon your honour and conscience, to speak the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, and your testimony today is subject to the same declaration.

Let me recall to the Court that when Commander Carrión came back to the stand last Friday, Mr. MacMichael was testifying about a plan prepared by the CIA for submission to the President of the United States, calling for covert activities against Nicaragua. He identified the plan as the one that was submitted for presidential approval and reported to the House and Senate Intelligence Committees in November 1981. He testified that he had participated in a discussion of the plan within the Central Intelligence Agency in the Fall of 1981, and he outlined the general elements of the plan and the ways in which it was anticipated that the Nicaraguan Government would respond. I shall now proceed with this line of questioning.

Mr. MacMichael, you have described the plan in general terms, I would now like to read from a newspaper account in the Washington Post purporting to contain excerpts from the actual CIA proposal to the President. It is reprinted in Annex F, submitted with the Memorial (Item 4, pp. 6-7).

The newspaper account reads:

> "According to highly classified NSC records the initial CIA proposal in November called for 'support and conduct of political and paramilitary operations against the Cuban presence and Cuban Sandinista support structures in Nicaragua and elsewhere in Central America'. The CIA in seeking presidential authorization for the $19 million paramilitary force emphasized that 'the programme should not be confined to that funding level or to the 500-man force described' the records show. Covert operations under the CIA proposal, according to the NSC records are intended to: 'build popular support in Central America and Nicaragua for an opposition front that would be nationalistic anti-Cuban and anti-Somoza' [the quotation continues:] 'support for the opposition front through formation and training of action teams to collect intelligence and engage in paramilitary and political operations in Nicaragua and elsewhere' 'work primarily through non-Americans' to achieve these covert objectives, but in some cases the CIA might take unilateral paramilitary action — possibly using United States personnel — against special Cuban targets."

Q.: To your recollection, does that accurately describe the plan that was discussed at the meeting you attended?

A.: Yes, it does, I do not in all honesty recall the emphasis or any discussion there of the possible unilateral use of United States forces or personnel against Cuban targets, but the rest of it squares very well with my recollection.

Q.: What was the overall purpose of the plan according to the discussion?

A.: The overall purpose, as I think I stated previously, was to weaken, even destabilize the Nicaraguan Government and thus reduce the menace it allegedly posed to the United States interests in Central America.

Q.: How was it supposed that the plan would accomplish these objectives?

A.: As I recall, and as I believe I stated the other day, the principal actions to be undertaken were paramilitary which hopefully would provoke cross-border attacks by Nicaraguan forces and thus serve to demonstrate Nicaragua's aggressive nature and possibly call into play the Organization of American States provisions. It was hoped that the Nicaraguan Government would clamp down on civil liberties within Nicaragua itself, arresting its opposition, demonstrating its allegedly inherent totalitarian nature and thus increase domestic dissent within the country, and further that there would be reaction against United States citizens, particularly against United States diplomatic personnel within Nicaragua and thus serve to demonstrate the hostility of Nicaragua towards the United States.

Q.: In the plan itself, was there any reference to the use of paramilitary forces to interdict a supposed flow of arms from Nicaragua to rebels in El Salvador?

A.: This was the stated purpose of the armed force to be organized. Yes, they were to interdict the alleged flow of arms.

Q.: Did the plan itself, or any supporting documents, refer to any evidence of such an arms flow?

A.: The plan merely stated in the discussions that such arms flow existed and no supporting documents were presented.

Q.: Was any other evidence of this type discussed at the meeting you attended?

A.: No. It was merely assumed that it went on.

Q.: You have testified that in Bangkok you examined problems of supplying guerrilla bands in the field with a view to verifying whether such supplies had come from outside sources and, if so, with a view to considering what measures might be taken to interdict those supplies. Is such a study ordinarily conducted as a matter of good professional practice as a preliminary to deciding on and designing a counter-insurgency arms interdiction programme?

A.: In my experience, I believe that would be the professional practice to determine, as best one could, what was the system one hoped to disrupt, and design a force as part of a counter-insurgency system to do that.

Q.: In your judgment as a professional, is it possible without such an analysis to design an effective programme to interdict arms supply to guerrilla forces?

A.: Well, I do not believe it would be, and I will state that this is what first caused me concern in this matter simply as a result of professional background that these studies and analyses fully describing the arms supply system — other parts of the supply system — for the insurgent forces in El Salvador were not being conducted and that a force was being put into the field for the purpose of disrupting that system without, it appeared to me, the proper analysis behind it.

Q.: And was such an analysis ever undertaken while you were at the Agency?

A.: Not to my knowledge, and I believe I would have known if it had been.

Q.: Now you stated earlier that the stated purpose of the plan was arms interdiction. In the light of your answers to these last few questions, would you elaborate on what you meant by your earlier characterization of "arms interdiction" as the stated purpose of the plan.

A.: Well, I think you will understand that this was a covert operation, and that in designing any covert operation was built into it — what is known as — plausible denial, that is you set it up so that if you are detected, or if the plan is detected, the operation's being uncovered, you have some justification either for denying participation or for making it clear that you had a reason for doing what you were doing. Now, in this case, I believe that part of the justification was the need to convince the intelligence committees of the United States Congress to authorize the plan and approve it and arms interdiction, I think, was a reason that they would approve because as the passage of the Boland amendment the following year demonstrated that such purposes as provoking hostilities between Nicaragua and any of its neighbours, or the destabilization of the Nicaraguan Government through this programme were prohibited purposes.

Q.: To your knowledge was the plan ever put into effect?

A.: Yes, it was.

Q.: Can you tell us anything about the CIA involvement in the execution of this plan after it was approved by the President and put into effect?

A.: No. I cannot talk about any operational details.

Q.: Now, I want to talk about the rest of your employment, not only that but this period too, with the CIA. You were employed by the CIA, the Court will recall, from March 1981 until April 1983; is that correct?

A.: That is correct.

Q.: During that entire period was it part of your responsibility to be familiar with and analyse the intelligence collected by the United States Government on the subject of delivery of arms or other war materials from Nicaragua to rebels in El Salvador?

A.: Yes, it was.

Q.: Now, how did that come about that that was part of your responsibility?

A.: Well, as I testified previously on the structure of the National Intelligence Council and the way in which the analytic group, of which I was part, worked in the Council, as a matter of practice members of the analytic group tended to specialize on one area as I did on the western hemisphere (Latin America, if you will) and as I also said we were responsible as individuals to report to the National Intelligence Council on matters of interest and concern; we were expected to show initiative, to develop subjects independently — we were, after all, a supposedly high level and qualified group — and as the work I was doing involved me first in a review of the special National Intelligence estimate of the nature of the Salvadoran insurgency, the work I did relative to Nicaragua, my awareness of the covert operation ongoing or under way, and the justification of it on the grounds of the arms flow, my concern, as I have expressed was about the proper design of an arms interdiction system which led me as a matter of my professional responsibility, and working with the approval of the National Intelligence officer at large who controlled our actions, to continue to make a close study of intelligence relating to the alleged arms flow from Nicaragua to El Salvador.

Q.: In the course of that work did you have access to original intelligence materials, for example, photographs, records of communications, intercepts, reports of interrogations, and the like?

A.: Yes, I did.

Q.: And did you examine them personally?

A.: Yes, I did.

Q.: Did you have access to so-called "finished" intelligence — summaries and reports based on or analysing the original raw material?

A.: Yes, I did.

Q.: Did you have occasion to discuss these issues of arms flow personally in debriefing intelligence officers who were, or had been, operating in the field?

A.: On various occasions, I did that, yes.

Q.: Did you ever make a request to see or review any intelligence material pertaining to this subject that was denied?

A.: No.

Q.: So you were familiar with the intelligence information that the United States Government collected with respect to arms or weapons trafficking between Nicaragua and rebels in El Salvador?

A.: Yes, I was.

Q.: All right. I want to direct your attention now to the period of your employment with the Agency; was there any credible evidence that during that period, March 1981 to April 1983, the Government of Nicaragua was sending arms to rebels in El Salvador?

A.: No.

Q.: Was there any substantial evidence that during this period arms were sent from or across Nicaraguan territory to rebels in El Salvador with the approval, authorization, condonation or ratification of the Nicaraguan Government?

A.: No, there is no evidence that would show that.

Q.: Was there any substantial evidence that during the same period, any significant shipments of arms were sent with the advance knowledge of the Government of Nicaragua from or across its territory to rebels in El Salvador?

A.: There is no such substantial evidence, no.

Q.: Was there any substantial evidence that during that period significant quantities of arms went to El Salvador from Nicaragua?

A.: From Nicaragua, that is originating in Nicaragua, no.

Q.: Was there substantial evidence of shipments of arms from other countries in the region to the El Salvador guerrillas?

A.: Yes, there was.

Q.: Could you give us some examples, please?

A.: I think the best known of these is the evidence developed on 15 March 1982, when there was a raid on an arms depot in San José, Costa Rica, at which time a considerable quantity of arms, well over a hundred rifles, automatic weapons of various sorts, other ordnance, mines and so forth, were captured there along with a significant number of vehicles — more than half a dozen I believe — that were used to transport these arms, or were designed for transporting them. Documents were captured with the people captured there — a multinational group I would say — which indicated that certainly more than half a dozen shipments of arms had already been made from that depot. The reason I failed to tell you on your previous question, Professor Chayes, was that it would appear to me that if arms were shipped from San José, Costa Rica, by vehicle, they must have in some way had to get across Nicaragua.

Q.: Now, you are familiar with the different methods and sources of intelligence that the United States employs?

A.: Yes, I am.

Q.: I am going to ask you a number of questions, based on information publicly available in the press and scholarly publications, about methods and sources of intelligence that are said to be employed by the United States. As to each one, I am going to ask you if you know whether or not that method or source was employed in an effort to obtain evidence of the delivery of arms or other war materials from Nicaragua to rebels in El Salvador. As I said before, I do not want you to say anything in responding to these questions that would involve unauthorized disclosure of information.

Let us begin with satellite photography. Is it a method of intelligence-gathering that was employed in an effort to obtain evidence of arms deliveries from Nicaragua to rebels in El Salvador?

A.: Now I don't recall that satellite photography or surveillance was used specifically for this purpose. I think it was used for gathering information about supposed or suspected shipments of arms and other materials from other places in the world to Nicaragua, but not for the shipment of arms to El Salvador.

Q.: What about aerial photography?

A.: Yes, this was used.

Q.: Were special surveillance aircraft used?

A.: Yes, they were.

Q.: Can you tell us about electronic interception of radio, telephonic and other communications?

A.: Yes, interceptions of radio communications were used.

Q.: There have been reports in the newspapers about a United States radar facility on Tiger Island in the Gulf of Fonseca between Nicaragua and El Salvador. Perhaps you could say how wide that Gulf is?

A.: I think from the furthest point of Nicaraguan territory to the nearest point of Salvadoran territory there is a stretch of something over 30 kilometres of water. The area is right here (indicates on map).

Q.: If the judges wish to locate it on their maps? Can you say whether there is such a facility on Tiger Island?

A.: I know there was, and I believe there still is there.

Q.: By what agency of the United States Government is it operated?

A.: That facility was manned by the United States Marine Corps.

A.: Oh yes.

Q.: What is the principal function of this facility?

A.: It was a radar facility that was designed to survey air and water traffic in the Gulf and surrounding areas — coastal areas.

Q.: Did United States naval vessels operate in conjunction with the Tiger Island facility?

A.: Yes, this was part of a surveillance, you know the electronic radar surveillance system which gave coverage, not only of the Gulf of Fonseca but for a considerable distance, a very long distance — I do not recall the exact mileage, but it is a very long distance — up and down the Pacific coast of Central America.

Q.: And was this system able to locate and track boats moving through the area?

A.: Yes.

Q.: There have also been published reports about the use of United States Navy SEAL teams on surveillance missions in and around the Gulf of Fonseca. Do you have any knowledge about that?

A.: Yes, the SEAL teams were employed for some time there — yes, they were.

Q.: What is a SEAL team exactly and what do they do in the Gulf of Fonseca?

A.: The acronym stands for sea, air, land. These are very highly trained special operations forces of the United States armed forces. They are naval personnel trained in underwater demolition, parachuting and other techniques. Their major purpose is to conduct a variety of special operations, including reconnaissance and surveillance in coastal waters and near inshore areas. They are capable of carrying out raids, reconnaissance, small boat operations, they are considered really as the most highly trained and best equipped of the United States special operations forces.

Q.: Another source of intelligence information is agents. Did the CIA employ such agents in an effort to obtain evidence of arms deliveries from Nicaragua to rebels in El Salvador?

A.: Yes, it did.

Q.: How about reports from United States diplomatic and military personnel in the area?

A.: Yes, reporting from these sources is all part of the information flow that is going on.

Q.: Were foreign diplomats and military personnel used as sources of intelligence in this effort?

A.: Yes. I should explain this a little bit. This does not mean that such personnel were in the employ of the United States Government or controlled by the Central Intelligence Agency or any other agency of the United States. It is just that in the course of their work, not only Central Intelligence Agency personnel but other United States personnel operating in a foreign country will routinely report on germane conversations that they have with their fellows operating in the same country. And I think I should also say, since you use the term intelligence here, that intelligence really has to be considered merely as information that is gathered and handled in a specific way. I think one could say that when reduced to paper intelligence is merely information that has a classification stamp placed on it, and to speak of intelligence is in no way to give a higher reliability to information; and this is what we were talking about, Professor Chayes, is simply that this information is coming from a variety of sources.

Q.: Were defectors a source of intelligence information in the effort to obtain evidence of arms deliveries?

A.: Oh yes, they were.

Q.: How about prisoners, captured rebels and the others?

A.: These are standard and usual sources of information.

Q.: Captured documents?

A.: Yes, those too.

Q.: Were there any significant sources and methods of intelligence gathering that the United States normally uses that were not employed in its effort to obtain evidence of arms deliveries from Nicaragua to rebels in El Salvador?

A.: No, I would say all usual means were employed.

Q.: Now, I am going to ask you to evaluate, or to turn your attention to, the United States intelligence capability in the area, and my question is this: considering all of the sources and methods of intelligence used by the United States that we have just catalogued, and your knowledge of the extent of their use with respect to Nicaragua, please describe in general terms the nature and scope of United States intelligence capabilities with respect to Nicaragua.

A.: Technically, in so far as I can judge, they were of a very high order. Certainly there were a great number of resources concentrated there in a very small area, so I would have to say that the capabilities of the United States intelligence in the area were very high indeed.

Q.: Can you say from your own knowledge based on your service in the Central Intelligence Agency whether Nicaragua has been a high priority target of United States intelligence-gathering efforts?

A.: I would say that it has been a high priority.

Q.: In your opinion, if the Government of Nicaragua was sending arms to rebels in El Salvador, could it do so without detection by United States intelligence-gathering capabilities?

A.: In any significant manner over this long period of time I do not believe they could have done so.

Q.: And there was in fact no such detection during the period that you served in the Central Intelligence Agency?

A.: No.

Q.: In your opinion, if arms in significant quantities were being sent from Nicaraguan territory to the rebels in El Salvador — with or without the Government's knowledge or consent — could these shipments have been accomplished without detection by United States intelligence capabilities?

A.: If you say in significant quantities over any reasonable period of time, no I do not believe so.

Q.: And there was in fact no such detection during your period of service with the Agency?

A.: No.

Q.: Mr. MacMichael, up to this point we have been talking about the period when you were employed by the CIA — 6 March 1981 to 3 April 1983. Now let me ask you without limit of time: did you see any evidence of arms going to the Salvadoran rebels from Nicaragua at any time?

A.: Yes, I did.

Q.: When was that?

A.: Late 1980 to very early 1981.

Q.: And what were the sources of that evidence?

A.: There were a variety of sources: there was documentary evidence, which I believe was credible; there were — and this is the most important — actual seizures of arms shipments which could be traced to Nicaragua and there were reports by defectors from Nicaragua that corroborated such shipments.

Q.: Does the evidence establish that the Government of Nicaragua was involved during this period?

A.: No, it does not establish it, but I could not rule it out.

Q.: At that time were arms shipments going to the El Salvadoran insurgents from other countries in the region?

A.: Yes, they were.

Q.: Could you give us examples?

A.: There were shipments at that time which could be traced to Costa Rica; there were shipments at that time that could be traced as having come through or via Panama.

Q.: And did the evidence of arms traffic from Nicaragua, if any, come to an end?

A.: The evidence of the type I have described disappeared. It did not come in any more after very early 1981, February/March at the latest.

Q.: You say at some time, just about the time you got to the Agency, the evidence stopped coming in: did it ever resume?

A.: As I have testified, no.

Q.: Now I direct your attention to the period after you left the CIA in April 1983. Did you follow the public statements by United States officials as to the existence of an arms flow from Nicaragua to rebels in El Salvador?

A.: Yes, I did.

Q.: And how did that happen?

A.: I had developed what you might describe as an interest in the subject and I did not relinquish that interest when I left the employ of the CIA, so I continued to follow it.

Q.: Have you analysed the purported evidence put forth publicly by the United States Government to support its allegations that such an arms flow exists?

A.: Yes, I have.

Q.: What is your expert opinion of the evidence that the United States has publicly disclosed?

A.: I would describe that evidence which has been publicly disclosed by the United States in various publications and statements by United States officials as very scanty. I would say much of it is unreliable, some of it is suspect and I believe it has been presented in a deliberately misleading fashion on many occasions.

Q.: Could you tell us what you mean by unreliable or suspect?

A.: There are a couple of things which strike me in looking at some of this information. There is a very heavy reliance in the presentation of this information, or its documentation, on statements, on press accounts, and especially upon accounts appearing in the foreign press, for example statements made in newspapers in Central America. Part of any covert operation as I hinted at, or even explained, a little earlier incorporates an element of disinformation. One of the primary means for doing this is the planting of articles in the press, and under some circumstances I think an informed person would suspect that some of the articles cited in support of the United States Government's position as evidence when it refers to press articles, as I say, allows the suspicion — and I said that the information was suspect — that these were articles originally planted by United States intelligence agencies, and for that reason I have some problems accepting them at face value.

A second aspect of the information presented is a very heavy reliance on defectors or captives, which I cannot certainly impeach directly. But the fact is that some of these statements are made by people who are or have been in the custody of the United States or other foreign governments for considerable periods and still are when they make the statements. As you know, on one famous occasion the United States Government was seriously embarrassed when a captive was brought before an audience in Washington, D.C. — a Mr. Tardensillas — to testify to his involvement in the Salvadoran insurgency as a representative of the Nicaraguan Government and recanted the statements he had previously made while under captivity in El Salvador and stated flatly that he only said those things because of the pressures he faced in his captivity. These are reasons why I tend to suspect certain information coming in certain ways.

Q.: Does any of this publicly disclosed material cause you to alter your opinion in any way as to the shipment of arms from Nicaragua to rebels in El Salvador?

A.: No, it does not cause me to alter my opinion.

Q.: The United States has stated that it has evidence that it cannot reveal for fear of compromising sensitive intelligence sources. I am going to ask you some questions to assist in analysing that claim. In this situation — surveillance of supposed arms trade between Nicaragua and the Salvadoran insurgents — would there be particularly sensitive intelligence sources or methods that we would not want to disclose?

A.: I would think the answer to that is yes, obviously.

Q.: What would they be?

A.: The ones that would occur to me particularly would be the protection of the identity of agents, obviously — human sources. One would be concerned for cryptographic security and possibly having implanted listening or other surveillance devices in important places one would not wish to reveal information that would cause the discovery of these.

Q.: Perthaps you could tell the Court what you mean by cryptographic security?

A.: In the simplest sense here, is that if you were deriving information because you had broken your opponent's code, you would not wish to refer to particular communications, encoded communications that you had intercepted, which would then tell your opponent that you had broken his code because he would then change his codes, and you would be faced with the task of decifering another one.

Q.: Let us assume that undercover agents or coded communications intercepts were providing accurate and reliable information concerning large-scale arms shipments from Nicaragua to the rebels in El Salvador. Would there be any way of revealing such evidence publicly without jeopardizing those sources?

A.: In the context of your question, and presuming that these intercepts or sources were providing accurate information over any significant period of time, then you would be able to use this information in order actually to intercept shipments of arms.

Q.: And then you could make public the intercept?

A.: That would be my opinion, yes.

Q.: But there have been no such intercepts?

A.: No, there have not.

Q.: Do you have a professional opinion on the United States Government's statements that concern for protection of its sources and methods of gathering intelligence prevents it from making public evidence of the alleged Nicaraguan arms traffic?

A.: I simply do not accept that statement at face value, I am very suspicious of it.

Q.: Now to summarize your testimony. You had access to and reviewed, in your professional capacity and as part of your duties for the Central Intelligence Agency between March 1981 and April 1983, the intelligence information on the subject of arms supply to the Salvadoran rebels, is that correct?

A.: That is correct.

Q.: That includes intelligence information from all the sources of intelligence that we have catalogued earlier in your testimony?

A.: Yes, it does.

Q.: In the intelligence information you reviewed, you found no convincing evidence of the supply of arms to the Salvadoran rebels by the Nicaraguan Government or the complicity of the Nicaraguan Government in such supply?

A.: I did not find any such evidence.

Q.: I would like to ask you, in your capacity as a professional intelligence analyst, does the absence of such evidence have any significance in evaluating the question of Nicaraguan supply of the Salvadoran rebels?

A.: I would say that it casts serious doubt on the proposition that the Nicaraguan Government is so involved.

Q.: Will you state again your overall conclusion as to the existence of arms traffic from Nicaragua to the Salvadoran insurgents?

A.: I do not believe that such a traffic goes on now or has gone on for the past four years at least, and I believe that the representations of the United States Government to the contrary are designed to justify its policies toward the Nicaraguan Government.

Professor CHAYES: That concludes the direct examination of Mr. MacMichael.

QUESTIONS PUT TO MR. MACMICHAEL BY JUDGES NI AND SCHWEBEL

The PRESIDENT: Two Judges have asked for the floor in order to put a question. Judge Ni and Judge Schwebel in that order. Judge Ni has the floor, he will ask his question. Would you like to have a copy of the question?

Mr. MACMICHAEL: Yes please.

Judge NI: I have two questions to ask the witness. The first one is, during the examination last Friday you were asked by Professor Chayes, is "Top Secret" the highest form of the clearance categories in the United States classification system. Your answer was, "Formerly, yes". You did not elaborate whether it was no longer the case now or what the place of top secret is now in the classification system. Can you explain further on this point?

Mr. MACMICHAEL: Your Honour, I must apologize for my poor enunciation. What I intended to say was formally, that is in form, yes that this is the highest classification recognized by the system, but there are means of close-holding and distributing certain intelligence only to selected persons. This is designated by types of letter designations that follow the clearance listing, there are directories that handle this and I do apologize for confusing you on the issue. I am sometimes confused myself.

Judge NI: Mr. President, I want to apologize to you. This should be struck from the records because it stands as "formerly" and now you are saying it was "formally"?

A.: Yes, your Honour.

Q.: My second question is, you were asked last Friday to tell the Court generally the outline of the plan which was discussed at a meeting of the Latin American Affairs Office in the Fall of 1981. You made a very succinct statement of the plan, that a covert force of approximately 1,500 men was to be organized to carry out military and paramilitary action in Nicaragua. Can you describe it more specifically, such as how this force was to be recruited and what instructions were to be given to the commanders of the force, etc. I believe you have described to some extent, in more detail today, but I wish that these two points, which I raised, as to how were they to be recruited and what instructions were to be given be answered more specifically.

A.: To the best of my recollection, your Honour, reference at this meeting was made to existing anti-Sandinista forces who were currently operating in the area and that these groups were to be organized and given supplies and assistance. I do not recall, and I do not believe, that at the meeting to which I referred that I heard anything about the instructions that were to be given to the commanders of those forces. I am sorry I cannot give you any more details than that but that is to the best of my recollection.

Judge SCHWEBEL: Mr. MacMichael, you were not present in Court when the Agent of Nicaragua read out Article 53 of the Court's Statute; it indicates that while the Court can render judgment in the absence of a State party, it cannot render a default judgment. Before deciding in favour of a claim, the Court "must satisfy itself that the claim is well-founded in fact and law", that is to say, that a sufficient defence to the claim is not well-founded in fact and law.

Now I take it that your testimony has been essentially directed to this question of whether there is a defence to the claim, and you will appreciate that the purpose of the questions I am about to ask you are directed towards that same matter. My first question is this. You stated that you went on active duty with the CIA on 6 March 1981 and left on 3 April 1983, or about that date. Am I correct in assuming that your testimony essentially relates to the period between March 1981 and April 1983, at least in so far as it benefits from official service?

Mr. MACMICHAEL: That is correct, your Honour, and I have not had access since I left to classified materials, and I have not sought access to such material.

Q.: Thus, if the Government of Nicaragua had shipped arms to El Salvador before March 1981, for example in 1980 and early 1981, in order to arm the big January offensive of the insurgents in El Salvador, you would not be in a position to know that; is that correct?

A.: I think I have testified, your Honour, that I reviewed the immediate past intelligence material at that time, that dealt with that period, and I have stated today that there was credible evidence and that on the basis of my reading of it I could not rule out a finding that the Nicaraguan Government had been involved during that period.

Q.: Would you rule it "in"?

A.: I prefer to stay with my answer that I could not rule it out, but to answer you as directly as I can my inclination would be more towards ruling "in" than ruling "out".

Q.: Are you aware, Mr. MacMichael, of the fact that the New York Times of 8 September 1985 published a report of an interview with Professor Chayes and Mr. Reichler, which says that "the lawyers for Nicaragua said that they would acknowledge that the Managua Government supplied arms to Salvadoran guerrillas for the big January offensive against the United States-backed Government in El Salvador"? And that "Mr. Reichler said that he strongly advised Nicaragua that it should not undertake the Court suit if it were still involved in arms traffic to El Salvador; have you seen that story?

A.: I was not in the United States when that story appeared so I don't recall seeing it.

Q.: Mr. MacMichael, is it correct to characterize Congressman Edward P. Boland, Chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence, as a leading opponent of United States policy in respect of support of the contras?

A.: I think it would be fair so to characterize him, yes, your Honour.

Q.: Would he have been briefed by intelligence officials on evidence supporting the United States claim that Nicaragua has been sending arms and lending other support to the insurgents in El Salvador?

A.: Yes, certainly in his capacity as the then Chairman of the House Intelligence Committee he received those briefings.

Q.: Now if your analysis of the force of intelligence collected in the period of your service is correct, how can you explain that Congressman Boland would have stated the following, as he did:

> "There is . . . persuasive evidence that the Sandinista Government of Nicaragua is helping train insurgents and is transferring arms and financial support from and through Nicaragua to the insurgents. They are further providing the insurgents bases of operations in Nicaragua . . . What this says is that, contrary to the repeated denials of Nicaraguan officials, that country is thoroughly involved in supporting the Salvadoran insurgency. That support is such as to greatly aid the insurgents in their struggle with government forces in El Salvador."

This was the view of Congressman Boland to which he has, as far as I know, adhered to this day. How do you explain that?

A.: Your Honour, this is a very important question and certainly one that I have attempted to deal with myself. I do not like to believe that my powers of judgment are greater than those of Congressman Boland. He has certainly seen the evidence, and it is my belief that the evidence that he saw was essentially the same evidence that I saw. I think, your Honour, I can refer you to a criticism that Congressman Boland's committee made on 17 September 1982 of the evidence that had been presented to them on the situation in Central America which I presume included that dealing with Nicaragua and its alleged relationship to an arms flow to El Salvador.

In a report issued, if I recall correctly, on 17 September 1982 by the House Intelligence Committee's subcommittee on evaluation of intelligence, reference was made to the presentation to that Committee of intelligence on Central America by the Central Intelligence Agency and other spokespersons for the Administration, and it was concluded, amongst other things, but I think this is the most relevant portion of the statement, that those presentations by the Administration seemed designed, and I am quoting here I think very closely, more to present the Administration's position than to illuminate the situation.

I am also aware that in May 1983 Mr. Boland's House Committee issued a report to which I believe all the members subscribed, both Democrat and Republican, and I do not know if that is the source from which you drew your statement, but it certainly represents a close approximation of Mr. Boland's statement as you read it to me, in which they found — and I believe the adjective used was "overwhelming" — the evidence that Nicaragua was involved in the supply of arms to the rebels in El Salvador and that without such provision of arms the Salvadoran insurgency would not exist. Naturally, I took that very seriously, because I have the greatest respect for Mr. Boland as I do for the others of that Committee, and I was interested to note as I read that report carefully that it was a report supporting House resolution, I believe the number is 2760, which called for an end to the funding for the contras. The reasoning employed by the Committee in reaching that recommendation was essentially that if the flow of arms from Nicaragua to El Salvador continued at such a high rate over such a period of time as the Administration claimed it did, obviously the contras — if I may use that general term as the force that was being provided — that force was obviously not serving the purpose for which it had been funded, and it should therefore be abolished. I do not know, and certainly could not demonstrate, I am sure, to anyone's complete satisfaction that the method employed in reaching that, both the proposition and then the conclusion following it, had something of the nature of a stipulation and it was not. I raise that question with you, your Honour, in what I hope is a response to your question.

Q.: Thank you so much, Mr. MacMichael, and that raises in my mind this question: let us suppose for a moment that your thesis is correct and that the arms flow from Nicaragua to El Salvador in the period of your tenure had substantially or entirely ceased. Let us assume for the moment that there were shipments of arms from Nicaragua to the El Salvador insurgents for the big offensive at the beginning of 1981, that, as Commander Carrión has testified, by the end of 1981, the CIA's support for the contras was in place. You come aboard I think in March 1981 and you are there until 1983, and during at least much of this period the contra operation was being funded actively and was in place. Is it not a plausible supposition that, far from being ineffective the contras were most effective, and that the very reason why the Nicaraguan Government stopped sending arms, if indeed it did, was because of the pressure of the contras? It could see that it was a counter-productive policy because it had produced United States funding of the contras where United States démarches had produced nothing. Is that plausible?

A.: I think it is plausible, your Honour, and I would go on with my response, if you desired me to do so. It is my proposition indeed, and my opinion if I may say so, that the alleged flow of arms from Nicaragua to the Salvadoran insurgents ceased, that no credible substantial evidence of such an arms flow existed in the time that I was examining it, and you propose, if I understand your question, that an explanation for this would be the excellent and effective interdiction and preventive work of this contra force.

Q.: No, if I may make myself a bit clearer, I am not suggesting that the contras were necessarily effective in interdicting arms flows. They may have been somewhat effective, they may have been ineffective, I frankly do not know, but my suggestion of a plausible explanation of the events you have described is that Nicaragua had perceived, that a policy of sending arms to insurgents in El Salvador had a price, and they feared it might have an even greater price, and therefore they stopped sending arms, if indeed they did, on which I take no position. I am just offering a hypothesis.

A.: The statement I was going to make there is, assuming that that is correct, it is then very difficult to explain why through the whole period the United States Government continued to maintain that this flow of arms went on, if indeed it had stopped as a result of the Nicaraguan Government's recognition of the perils it faced in continuing to involve itself, or appeared to involve itself. It is indeed strange to me that the United States Government continued to claim it went on.

Q.: I quite agree, if indeed it had stopped. I said that I am speaking in terms of a hypothesis.

To turn to another aspect of these facts, Mr. MacMichael, is it a fact that leaders of the El Salvadoran insurgency are based in Nicaragua and regularly operate without apparent interference from Nicaraguan authorities in Nicaragua?

A.: I think the response to that question would have to be a qualified yes, in that political leaders and, from time to time, military leaders, of the Salvadoran insurgency have been reported credibly to have operated from Nicaragua, that this was referred to frequently by the United States Government as a command and control headquarters, and that such an action could certainly be defined as one unfriendly toward the Government of El Salvador recognized by the United States. I have confined my testimony to the charge of the arms flow. To my knowledge, the United States Government did not justify or attempt to justify its support for this covert force on the grounds that a directing group of the Salvadoran rebels, either habitually or from time to time, made its headquarters in Nicaragua.

Q.: May I ask if you have read the Declaration of Intervention of the Republic of El Salvador filed in this case on 15 August 1984?

A.: I have not.

Q.: May I recall that that Declaration contains detailed accounts of the shipment of arms from Nicaragua to insurgents in El Salvador; maintains that the general headquarters of the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front is located near Managua; and claims that:

> "In addition to the entire terrorist training operation established in Cuba, since mid-1980 the Sandinista National Liberation Front has made available to Salvadoran guerrillas training sites in Nicaraguan territory."

What in particular is your view of this charge of the existence of training sites in Nicaragua?

A.: I have no direct or current knowledge of those. I am not trying to avoid your question, your Honour, it is just a thing that I have heard charged. I do not want to trivialize this response, but let me say this because it may help to put it in perspective, I have seen aerial photographs, provided through intelligence systems, of places in Nicaragua identified as FMLN training camps and some places where, for example, white-washed stones are put out with the initials FMLN. I could not help but notice as I took the tram to Delft yesterday that a large wall in Rijswijk is painted with the letters FMLN. As I say I do not wish to trivialize it, but there is, and I accept this fully, I believe, as Nicaragua has stated, there is diplomatic, political and moral support for the FMLN. There is also a considerable Salvadoran population which resides technically as refugees, within Nicaragua. These people are not confined to camps as they are elsewhere in Central America. They live within the economy there, and go about their business freely. I am more than willing to believe, as a matter of fact, as a matter of experience, I assume that just as is believed, for example that Irish-Americans, resident in New York City and Boston, occasionally do make the odd lot of arms and other assistance, monetary and otherwise, available to the Irish Republican Army in Ulster, that this Salvadoran population whose symphathies, I assure you from some contact with them, are basically with the FMLN, find means to get support to their brethren in El Salvador. Now whether the Nicaraguan Government should be more diligent in policing the activities of these people is another question, and one to which I cannot meaningfully respond. I hope that in responding, your Honour, I have not trivialized your question.

Q.: No, not at all, and it is a real question whether or not the Nicaraguan Government is doing what it can to prevent such activities, if that is its policy. But, a second question is: is the policy of the Nicaraguan Government not to prevent, but to assist such activities, which I do not think is the policy of the United States Government, in any event, vis-à-vis insurgent operations in Northern Ireland.

Now, Mr. MacMichael, it was acknowledged in Court last week on behalf of Nicaragua that, before Somoza's overthrow, the Sandinistas had received foreign assistance — arms and training — and that among the States giving such assistance was Cuba. Do you have reason to believe that, whereas Cuba gave such assistance to Sandinistas, it denies such assistance to the insurgents of El Salvador?

A.: Denies, in what sense, your Honour?

Q.: Refuses to give it, declines to give it, fails to give it.

A.: I think I have reason to believe that the Cuban Government is supportive of the FMLN.

Q.: If Cuba does give such assistance, not simply moral support, but arms, training and so on, would it not be plausible for it to channel some of that assistance through Nicaragua, to whose Government Cuba has given such massive assistance since the Sandinistas took power?

A.: I would like to answer in this way: first of all, as a general proposition I do not see any reason that the fact that if Cuba provides massive economic support to Nicaragua or any economic support to Nicaragua, it would necessarily follow that it would channel its assistance, if any, to the FMLN through Nicaragua. It might choose, as a matter of reason, to protect its investment in Nicaragua by channelling it in some other place. But, I would say that my opinions about the nature and type of Cuban support to the FMLN would not, and I am trying to use good judgment here in saying this, would not necessarily, or needfully mean that Cuba was going to require, if that is what you intended in your question, that Nicaragua also involve itself directly in its support.

Q.: Thank you. No, that was not the purport of my question. The purport of it was this, that since Cuba is sending very large quantities of arms to Nicaragua, while co-operating with the Soviet Union in the sending of such arms, is it not plausible that it would, being an ardent supporter of the rebellion in El Salvador, choose to channel some of those arms through Nicaragua?

A.: I can only say it might. I cannot speak for it. But let me just go a little bit further. I am speaking now of my experience within the CIA, within the intelligence community, trying to deal with these questions and get down to hard evidence, and as I explained to the Court previously, my training has unhappily been as a historian and I have a penchant for re-examining evidence perhaps too closely, I do not know, but the question of assumptions comes up all the time. For example, at one period I recall, when there were a considerable number of messages intercepted, we have talked about intercepts, so I think I can mention this, in which Cuban aircraft, at the time when Cuba was providing a great number of teachers in Nicaragua, had cargoes described as notebooks and pencils, there was an assumption by a certain number of my fellow analysts that these were jargon terms referring to rifles and bullets. Now, that is my feeling about assumptions, it may be that you are absolutely correct, I just cannot draw the assumption clearly myself.

Q.: I am not drawing conclusions either, Mr. MacMichael, I am just asking you would it be plausible?

A.: Plausible, yes.

Q.: Mr. MacMichael, have you heard of Radio Liberacion?

A.: I have heard of Radio Liberacion, yes.

Q.: What is it? Can you tell the Court, please?

A.: It was a predecessor of the present Radio Venceremos which is used by the FMLN in El Salvador. I believe that at one time a radio broadcast under the title of "Radio Liberacion" was supposed to have originated from Nicaraguan soil.

Q.: Did they in fact originate from Nicaragua, to the best of your knowledge?

A.: To the best of my knowledge I think I would say yes, that is the information I have.

Q.: Have you heard of an airfield in Nicaragua at Papalonal, or an airstrip?

A.: Yes, I have.

Q.: Are you aware of the fact that the United States Government under the Carter Administration made representations to the Nicaraguan Government about the use of that airfield as a principal staging area for the airlift of arms to insurgents in El Salvador?

A.: Yes, I recall that very well.

Q.: In an interview with the Washington Post published on 30 January 1981, the outgoing Secretary of State, Edmund Muskie, stated that arms and supplies being used in El Salvador's bloody civil war were flown from Nicaragua "certainly with the knowledge and to some extent the help of Nicaraguan authorities". Now as you know the Administration for which Mr. Muskie spoke had given more than $100 million in aid to the Sandinista Government since it took power.

A.: That is correct.

Q.: More than the United States had given Nicaragua under the Somozas in more than 40 years. Do you think that Mr. Muskie was speaking the truth?

A.: Oh yes, in that case. For example, I spoke earlier under direct questioning from Professor Chayes regarding information that had existed for that period — late 1980 to very early 1981 — and when I mentioned defectors I had in mind as a matter of fact some persons who testified under interrogation — I should not say testified — but who stated under interrogation following their departure from Nicaragua that they had assisted in the operations out of Papalonal in late 1980 and very early 1981, and as I say, I am aware of this; there was also an interception of an aircraft that had departed there — that had crashed or was unable to take off again from El Salvador where it landed — and I think that was in either very early January or late December 1980 and this was the type of evidence to which I referred, which disappeared afterwards.

Q.: I understand you to be saying, Mr. MacMichael, that you believe that it could be taken as a fact that at least in late 1980 or early 1981 the Nicaraguan Government was involved in the supply of arms to the Salvadoran insurgency. Is that the conclusion I can draw from your remarks?

A.: I hate to have it appear that you are drawing this from me like a nail out of a block of wood but, yes, that is my opinion.

Q.: Now let us turn to 1982 because you referred to an episode a little while ago in that regard, namely, that arms were found in — I believe you said — San José, Costa Rica, on 15 March 1982 — rifles, etc., and the multinational group tending to this arms cache was found. Now as I believe you know, Cuba sent large quantities of arms to the Sandinistas when they were fighting Somoza through, and to, Costa Rica, and the Costa Rican National Assembly made an investigation of that arms traffic and reported that quantities of those arms had been left behind in Costa Rica after the overthrow of Somoza. Do you believe that this arms cache indeed was of Cuban origin, destined for the Sandinistas, and in fact, perhaps with the aid of Costa Rican collaborators, meant to move on to El Salvador now that Somoza had been overthrown and it was not so much needed by the Sandinistas?

A.: I could allow for the possibility of that, I do not know it and I do not know that the investigation carried out in Costa Rica at that time or the information developed from that arms seizure made any connection with Nicaragua at all. I believe that one or two of the persons of this multinational group, which included a Chilean, an Argentine, several Costa Ricans, some Salvadorans, etc. — that one or two of these was of Nicaraguan nationality.

Q.: Yes, I think that that is correct. Let us turn to 1983, Mr. MacMichael, I think this is also in the period of your service. A United States reporter named Sam Dillon visited a small Nicaraguan port, called La Concha, located about 60 kilometres across the Gulf of Fonseca from El Salvador. In his story in the Washington Post — a newspaper, I might note, which is known for its frequent criticism of the Reagan Administration — which appeared on 21 September 1983, at page A29, he recorded that:

> "A radio-equipped warehouse and boat facility, disguised as a fishing co-operative on an island in northwestern Nicaragua, has served for three years as a transshipment point for smuggling arms to El Salvador, numerous residents here say."

Do you think, Mr. Dillon reported false information?

A.: No, I would have no quarrel with the information that Mr. Dillon reported, I have read that article. I could comment upon it: I would reply to it more accurately if I had a copy in front of me but if that is not possible I will point out a number of things about it. One that raises a great many questions, as a careful reading of the article will indicate — one of these is raised merely by the headline, but even before I go into that, what I will say is that it always surprises me to some extent when the United States Government, in attempting to make its case on this point, so flagrantly delivers as evidence statements in the public press, when one would hope they would have something more substantial to put forward. This is not at all to impeach the Washington Post or Mr. Sam Dillon or newspapers. The headline of course is misleading: because it simply states as a fact that an arms shipment point has been raided. It states that it was raided by forces of the Nicaraguan Democratic Front, the FDN, when subsequent evidence has informed us that it was carried out by agents working directly for the Central Intelligence Agency, that is, so-called unilaterally controlled Latin assets. Reference in this story is also made to the press statement issued by the FDN about this. In my own conversations several months ago with Mr. Edgar Chamorro we talked about this: he pointed out that the press statement, which allegedly came from the FDN, was one that had been prepared within the Central Intelligence Agency and handed to him to present as if it were supposed to have been — and I will make a general observation here, if I may — as if this was supposed to have been a major transshipment point for arms within Nicaragua and going to El Salvador, and had been identified by the competent intelligence authorities of the United States. Given the scepticism that had been raised for some time and the demand for hard evidence, in the form of arms seizures, within the United States to support this case, it seems to me — as it seemed to me when I first became aware of that — that the goal would have been to gain as much presentable evidence in the form of photographs, in the form of tracking boats leaving that place to El Salvador, of seizing arms shipments, of taking prisoners, and so forth. Not to send a force in to destroy the entire facility, leaving behind the following items — if I recall the article correctly — a Nicaraguan army banner — I believe is described there — which if it were a clandestine installation, is a surprising item to have there.

Secondly, a target which had been fired at and shell casings which presumably came from the weapons which had fired at the target, the remains of three long wooden crates, was the entire physical evidence left behind. If this was indeed a super-secret facility, it is also puzzling, although it may simply indicate a great deal of confusion with the Nicaraguan Government, that western reporters were allowed free access to this site immediately, that they spoke without hindrance to people living in the area and that there was only present one person described as a shotgun-toting guard, who does not appear to have been a member of the Nicaraguan armed forces. There is a further statement within the article that on, at least, the basis of conversations with local residents, some years previously, shortly after the events of July 1979, that military men not further described came to the area seeking the services of experienced smugglers and the experienced smuggler was named in the article. I cannot unfortunately recall the name now. All this, to me, raises a great deal of questions — what was this facility? The statements made by people living in the surrounding area, such as "I don't mix in politics but everybody knows" — this is what they said — may, or may not, be valid statements. And I do not want to be in a position, your Honour, of trying to explain away everything I see, but that is my job, to examine this sort of thing, and say why there are so many questions coming out of this. That is the only response I can make to your bringing this article up at this time.

Judge SCHWEBEL: I might read out what was said in the Declaration of Intervention of El Salvador on this point, with particular regard to it being a super-secret facility of any sophistication.

> "In late 1983 a United States reporter named Sam Dillon visited a small Nicaraguan port, called La Concha, located about 60 kilometres across the Gulf of Fonseca, from El Salvador. Mr. Dillon reported that the residents of the so-called fishing co-operative had, as traditional smugglers, introduced, since 1979, large quantities of weapons into El Salvador under instructions of the Nicaraguan Government."

That is the perception of the Government of El Salvador of these events.

Mr. MACMICHAEL: That is their perception, yes.

Judge SCHWEBEL: Mr. MacMichael, the New York Times of 13 July 1984 carried a story of an interview with a former Salvadoran guerrilla commander who was captured in Honduras, who stated that virtually all the arms received by rebel units he led came from Nicaragua, and that Salvadoran guerrillas have their headquarters in Nicaragua. The name of the former guerrilla is Arquimedes Canadas also known as Commander Alejandro Montenegro. Have you any comment on that story?

Mr. MACMICHAEL: Yes, your Honour, I do. I would like to point out that as in the case of any statement made by a prisoner or defector I am not in any way in a position to directly impeach the statement. I simply want to point out, as I did earlier in my testimony, that a heavy reliance on the sort of testimony of people being held, as in the case of Arquimedes Canadas, better known as Commander Alejandro Montenegro, who, incidentally, was a very successful FMLN commander, — he led an attack on the Ilopango airfield in 1982 and destroyed much of what was then the Salvadoran air force. He was captured in August 1982 in a safe house in Tegucigalpa in Honduras. I was aware of his capture and had access to the results of his initial interrogations. At that time he made no mention of arms. Indeed, I could say certainly that the object of much of his interrogation had to do with his leadership of the raid on the Ilopango airfield; where he received his training, and so forth.

Q.: Where was that? Where did he receive his training?

A.: He testified that he received it in Cuba. Earlier in 1982 this gentleman had met with western reporters in the field in El Salvador and stated, at that time, that the vast majority of the arms used by his force were arms that were either purchased on the black market or captured in combat in El Salvador. When he made his statements reported in July 1984, almost two years after his capture, during which time he had been in the hands of very skilled interrogators, he told a very different story. Now, which story is correct I am in no way able to judge, and I have testified to a certain point and I am raising questions that will tend to support my point of view, and I am not trying to explain away everything you advance.

Q.: Fair enough. Now you spoke before of that famous incident in which the United States came forward with a defector who was introduced as someone who would testify to Nicaraguan support for the Salvadoran insurgency and, in fact, he did not, and he testified, in fact, that it was not so, and that he was put up to saying so, and so on. Is that correct?

A.: That is true.

Q.: What became of that gentleman may I ask?

A.: He is, to my knowledge, in Nicaragua today.

Q.: I see. He wasn't shot on the spot? He showed no signs of torture? He walked away as a free man? He was in Nicaragua, welcomed as a hero. Is that not correct?

A.: I do not know, your Honour, as to whether he showed any signs of torture. I had no chance to examine him physically. I will accept and glory in the fact, as you do too, that people who appear in the custody of the United States Government, in the United States of America, under guarantees given by that Government, find those guarantees respected and in his case they were.

Q.: Right, now given his example, do you see any reason why a defector from the Salvadoran insurgency should fear to speak the truth? They can well see that if they come out with a story contrary to that which one would suppose the United States would want to hear, a hero's welcome would await them in Nicaragua. So why wouldn't they speak the truth?

A.: Well, we haven't referred to any other Nicaraguan captives or defectors here. The persons about whom we have been talking were, I thought, Salvadorans who had left the FMLN.

Q.: Yes. But as you know there are a large number of such defectors both from Salvadoran and Nicaraguan sources whose testimony is similar to that of the nature I have cited to you. I could go on and on giving you examples like this, but I do not think we can take the time of the Court. My point is simply, that, is not this single example of the treatment of that single captive suggestive of the fact that persons in the custody of the United States need not fear to speak the truth as they know it? Would that not be the lesson you would draw if you were in a similar situation?

A.: I certainly believe that is the case.

Judge SCHWEBEL: That concludes my questions, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT: At the moment there are no questions to be put to you. After the coffee break, if there are any questions, I hope you will be available to the Court to answer questions.

Mr. MACMICHAEL: I am, Sir, available to the Court as long as it wants me, your Honour.

WITNESS CALLED BY THE GOVERNMENT OF NICARAGUA

The PRESIDENT: For the moment there are no further questions for the second witness so we may summon the third witness, that is Professor Glennon.

Mr. ARGÜELLO GÓMEZ: Yes, Mr. President, the next witness will be Professor Michael Glennon. He will be examined by Mr. Paul Reichler.

Mr. REICHLER: Mr. President, Members of the Court, may it please the Court, my task is to ask the questions of this witness. I would like to ask the witness first if he will please make the solemn declaration.

Professor GLENNON: I solemnly declare upon my honour and conscience that I will speak the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth.

Q.: Would you please state your full name?

A.: My name is Michael John Glennon.

A.: I live at 3455 Cornell Place, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Q.: What is your nationality?

A.: I am a citizen of the United States of America.

Q.: How are you presently employed?

A.: I am an adjunct professor of law at the New York University Law School and a full professor of law at the University of Cincinnati College of Law.

Q.: When did you become a professor of law?

A.: I became an adjunct professor at the New York University Law School in 1977. I became a professor at the University of Cincinnati College of Law in 1981.

Q.: When and where did you obtain your law degree?

A.: I was graduated from the University of Minnesota Law School in 1973.

Q.: In your academic work, do you specialize in any particular area or areas of the law?

A.: I teach international law and constitutional law. My speciality is the constitutional aspects of the United States foreign relations power; specifically, the distribution of power between the President and the Congress in areas such as treaty-making and the war power.

Q.: Have you published books or articles or received honours in this area?

A.: I have published a number of articles in these fields. I have also received several honours; in 1981, I co-authored a five-volume work entitled United States Foreign Relations Law with Professor Thomas M. Franck of the New York University Law School. That work was awarded the Certificate of Merit by the American Society of International Law. In Spring of this year, 1985, I was awarded the Deak Prize by the American Society of International Law for the best article by a younger author to appear in the American Journal of International Law over the previous year. The article concerned the war-powers resolution and the effectiveness and constitutionality of statutory limitations on the President's war-making power.

Q.: Are you active in any professional organizations?

A.: Yes, I am active in the American Society of International Law. I was appointed to a committee of the American Society of International Law to study the jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice, specifically whether the United States should modify or terminate its declaration accepting ICJ jurisdiction and, if so, how constitutionally that is required to be done. I am also a member of a panel of the International Law Association (the American branch) set up to study the use of force in relations among States.

Q.: What previous professional employment have you had and what were the time periods?

A.: From 1973 to 1977 I was assistant counsel in the office of the Legislative Counsel of the United States Senate. From 1977 to 1980, I was the Legal Counsel to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate. From 1980 to 1981, I was associated with a law firm in Washington, D.C., which practised international law, and from 1981 until the present I have been a professor of law at the University of Cincinnati College of Law.

Q.: When you worked in the United States Senate Legislative Counsel's office, what were your responsibilities?

A.: The office of the Legislative Counsel is something of the nature of an in-house law firm. It does legal work for the Senate, Senators and Senate committees. I was assigned to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, which had no counsel on its staff at the time. All of its legal work was given to the office of the Legislative Counsel and assigned to me. That work included answering the Committee's inquiries on matters of international law, constitutional law, statutory interpretation and particularly statutory drafting.

Q.: What were your responsibilities when you were the legal counsel to the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate?

A.: While I was the Committee's legal counsel I was responsible as the principal lawyer for the Committee for matters involving international law, constitutional law and statutory interpretation. I did such things as help set up hearings for the Committee; I put together lists of witnesses; I suggested questions for the senators to ask witnesses; I drafted legislation that the Committee requested concerning matters on which the committee concluded that some new law was necessary; and in general I was responsible for answering the Committee's questions on all the legal matters before it. In addition to my responsibilities as the legal counsel to the full Committee, I was also assigned to the staff of the Committee's Subcommittee on International Operations. The Subcommittee on International Operations was charged expressly with oversight of the State Department. As a member of that subcommittee staff I was responsible for determining whether the Department of State was operating within the bounds of the law and in that capacity met regularly with State Department officials and frequently interviewed them with a transcriber present. I reported my findings to the subcommittee and made recommendations concerning how the law needed to be changed in instances where it did.

Q.: Did you have occasion in the early part of this year to conduct a fact-finding mission in Nicaragua?

A.: I did, yes.

Q.: On whose behalf did you conduct this fact-finding mission?

A.: The mission was sponsored by the International Human Rights Law Group and the Washington Office on Latin America.

Q.: What is the International Human Rights Law Group?

A.: The International Human Rights Law Group is a private non-profit independent American organization which is comprised of prominent members of the Washington, D.C., Bar; the group is active in investigating human rights matters and human rights litigation.

Q.: What is the other sponsoring organization, the Washington Office on Latin America?

A.: The Washington Office on Latin America is also a private non-profit independent American organization, which is funded by church groups and foundations, including the Ford Foundation. It too is interested in human rights matters, specifically in the Central American region.

Q.: What was the purpose of this fact-finding mission?

A.: A number of reports had come to the attention of the two sponsoring organizations which had alleged serious abuses by the contras of the rights of civilians in Nicaragua. The sponsoring organizations asked us to go to Nicaragua and to determine the validity of these allegations. The sponsoring organizations also asked us to make some assessment of United States responsibility, if any, for the incidents described in these allegations.

Q.: From what sources have the sponsoring organizations received information pertaining to the activities of the contras?

A.: From a number of sources. They had a rather thick pile of newspaper clippings alleging contra abuses. They also had received about 140 signed sworn affidavits by Mr. Reed Brody, who was an Assistant Attorney General in New York and a member of the New York Bar. He had travelled to Nicaragua, spent four months in Nicaragua, and looked extensively into the alleged abuses of the contras. They also had allegations from groups such as Americas Watch and it was the feeling of these two sponsoring organizations that because the Congress was again presented by President Reagan with a request to fund the contras, before that decision was made by the Congress, in view of the paucity of evidence concerning the validity of these allegations, some methodical and purposeful investigation needed to take place.

Q.: Who else besides yourself was a member of this delegation?

A.: Mr. Donald T. Fox.

Q.: What were Mr. Fox's qualifications for this work?

A.: Mr. Fox is a senior partner in a New York law firm. He is a member of the International Commission of Jurists and as Vice-President is head of the American Branch. Mr. Fox has also been involved in human rights matters in the past. He conducted an on-site investigation of human rights abuses in Guatemala in 1979.

Q.: Did anyone else accompany you on this mission?

A.: Yes, the sponsoring organizations hired an interpreter, Dr. Valerie Miller, who was also accompanied by an observer from the office of Congressman Sam Gejdenson of Connecticut. Congressman Gejdenson is a member of the Sub-Committee of the House Foreign Affairs Committee with responsibility for Central America.

Q.: Did the sponsoring organizations define for you the scope of your mission?

A.: Yes, they did. They asked us first to look into the validity of the allegations that had been presented to them concerning abuses by the contras directed at the civilian population in Nicaragua. They also asked us to make some assessment of the responsibility, if any, of the United States Government for the activities of the contras.

Q.: Who decided on what methodology your delegation would use in conducting its investigation in Nicaragua?

A.: The methodology was determined exclusively by Donald Fox and myself.

Q.: Would you describe to the Court in general terms how you did conduct your inquires into the activities of the contras and the responsibility, if any, of the United States?

A.: Yes, with respect to the contras, we went to Nicaragua. We interviewed about 36 people who were located in the area of northern Nicaragua, along the border of Honduras, where the contras had been active and where a number of the alleged incidents were said to have occurred. In investigating these incidents we visited the towns of Esteli, La Estancia, Condega, Matagalpa and the capital city of Manuagua, of course. With respect to the responsibility of the Department of State, we met with officials from the Department of State in Washington before we left for Nicaragua. While we were in Nicaragua we met in Managua with the United States Ambassador to Nicaragua, Mr. Harry Burgold, and when we returned to Washington we met again with officials of the Department of State.

Q.: Who determined your itinerary in Nicaragua?

A.: Donald Fox and I determined our itinerary.

Q.: How did you decide on that itinerary?

A.: We asked the recommendations of a number of people before we left including officials of the Department of State and members of different human rights organizations, including Americas Watch. We also adjusted our itinerary along the way based on information that we gathered in the interviews.

Q.: Was the Nicaraguan Government involved in any way in planning or approving your itinerary?

A.: Absolutely not.

Q.: Did the Nicaraguan Government participate in or influence your inquiry in any way?

A.: It did not.

Q.: Did you receive any assistance from the Nicaraguan Government in the course of your investigations?

A.: Yes, we did. We determined that it was necessary to interview the captured head of contra intelligence from the Department of Nuevo Segovia who was at the time that we were in Nicaragua incarcerated in the Modelo prison in Tipitapa. We requested and received the permission of the Nicaraguan Government to interview this individual in the prison. I might add that we interviewed him by ourselves, without any representative of the Government being present. Second, we hired at market rates a car and a driver from the Nicaraguan Government, which we concluded, while we were in Washington, was the only practical means of getting about the country safely and seeing the people that we needed to see.

Q.: Who determined which people you would see and interview?

A.: Donald Fox and I determined whom we would see exclusively by ourselves.

Q.: Was the Nicaraguan Government involved in any way in your selection of these people?

A.: Absolutely not. As a matter of fact, we discovered at one point that an over-zealous contact person had sought and received the assistance of a local government official in locating the person that we wanted to talk to and because of this involvement of the Government we concluded that it would be best to exclude that individual's statement from our report.

Q.: How did you select the people whom you interviewed in the places you visited in Nicaragua?

A.: We selected the persons to be interviewed in several different ways. First, when we went to the different cities we frequently spoke to the priests who had parishes in those cities and we asked the priests whether any of their parishioners had had any experiences with the contras and, if so, whether these individuals would be credible. Second, we spoke to Americans who were living or had lived in Nicaragua and asked them whom we should talk to: these were frequently members of religious groups, such as Witnesses for Peace. Third, some of the interviews that we conducted created leads that led to other individuals that we believed we should interview. Finally, a number of people simply came to see us, having heard that we were in town, and having something to tell us.

Q.: Can you generally describe the people whom you interviewed?

A.: Yes, the people that we interviewed came from all walks of life. They were generally aged from about 20 to about 60. They were from a variety of different occupations — truck drivers, bus drivers, telephone technicians, coffee pickers, housewives. Many of them seemed to be Government supporters; some did not; most appeared apolitical. Most were devout Catholics.

Q.: Who actually conducted the interviews?

A.: Donald Fox and I conducted all the interviews ourselves. Normally we conducted the interviews together, although occasionally in the interest of time we split up and conducted the interviews separately.

Q.: Where were the interviews conducted?

A.: Generally the interviews were conducted in the houses, or more accurately, the huts of the people that we were interviewing.

Q.: Did any representative of the Nicaraguan Government participate in any of these inverviews?

A.: No.

Q.: How did you determine the veracity of the persons you interviewed?

A.: In several ways. We cross-examined people quite closely. We asked probing questions; we compared notes afterwards on our assessments of their demeanour and credibility. We asked the individuals if there were other witnesses to the events they described, and if possible we interviewed those persons. Finally, we cross-checked their stories, where possible, against whatever documentary sources were available.

Q.: Did you rely on any statements that were not first-hand accounts?

A.: We did not. We accepted only first-hand accounts and sought generally to adhere to American standards of evidence, which preclude the admission of hearsay.

Q.: Were there any witnesses whose veracity you doubted?

A.: Yes, there were two witnesses whose veracity we doubted. One was a middle-aged man who seemed to recall events in amazing detail. His story was plausible, but we thought that to be safe we should probably exclude it. Second, an 18-year-old girl described events in terms that we thought were exaggerated, and we therefore excluded her statement from our report as well.

Q.: So a report of your fact-finding mission was prepared?

A.: That is correct.

Q.: Who prepared the report?

A.: Donald Fox and I.

Q.: Was the report ever published?

A.: Yes, the report was published in April 1985 by our two sponsors.

Q.: And does your report have a title?

A.: Yes, it does.

Q.: Would you read it to us?

A.: The title is "Report of Donald T. Fox, Esquire, and Michael J. Glennon, to the International Human Rights Law Group in the Washington Office on Latin America concerning Abuses against Civilians by Counter-revolutionaries operating in Nicaragua, April 1985".

Q.: Since the report is already in evidence in this case at Annex I to Nicaragua's Memorial of 30 April 1985, I would like to ask you if you could very briefly recall for the Court your findings and conclusions as to the activities of the contras?

A.: With respect to the contras, our conclusions were as follows. We found that there is substantial credible evidence that the contras are engaged with some frequency in acts of terroristic violence directed at Nicaraguan civilians. These are individuals who have no connection with the war effort — persons with no economic, political or military significance. These are individuals who are not caught in cross-fire between Government and contra forces, but rather individuals who are deliberately targeted by the contras for acts of terror. We found that the contras do in addition target economic institutions such as coffee processing plants, lumber-yards, radio stations and the like, but we found, as I say, that there is substantial credible evidence that the contras with some frequency direct terroristic violence at Nicaraguan civilians.

Q.: You said that the contras engage in terroristic violence, in acts of terror. Can you tell the Court what you mean by terror?

A.: I use the term "terror" in the same sense in which it is used in the United States law, and I refer the Court's attention to Public Law 98-533, which was enacted only this year. It defines an act of terrorism as an activity that involves a violent act or an act dangerous to human life that is a violation of the criminal laws, and appears to be intended to intimidate or coerce a civilian population, to influence the policy of a government by intimidation or coercion, or to affect the conduct of a government by assassination or kidnapping. We found that those are precisely the kinds of activities in which the contras deliberately engage.

Q.: I know that your report makes reference to a number of incidents of what you have defined as acts of terror. Could you give the Court some very brief examples to illustrate what you mean?

A.: Yes, I would like to read for the Court the statements that we took from three individuals. These statements were made in their own words.

The first is María-Julia Ortíz, aged 28, whom we interviewed in Jalapa on 25 February 1985.

> "It was 24 October 1984 at Pied de la Cuesta, where I lived at the time. The contras came about 4.30 a.m. They banged on the door and said 'Get up you rabid dog'. My husband did not want to open the door. They broke it down with the butts of their rifles. My husband said 'I am ill'. The contras said 'That's not what we're asking you. If you don't get up we're going to throw a grenade in your house.' He was frightened. He knew what they were going to do to him because they had broken down the door. He had run into the other room. They hit him on the neck with a gun, knocking him unconscious. Then they took him into the corridor and tied him up. Then, while he was lying on the ground, they hit him on the eye. My children could see what was happening. I have three — four with the one now because I am pregnant. Then they took bayonets and slit his throat. I saw all of this from under the bed. After they slit his throat they said 'Where is this guy's wife?' While he lay there bleeding to death, my little girl said 'What's happening to daddy?' The contra then grabbed me and said 'Come with us', and tried to pull me from the children. When I resisted they hit me and I fell unconscious. When I woke up on my cot the contras were going through our belongings, taking what they wanted. When they finished, a contra who had been giving instructions from outside asked those inside 'Did you do what you were supposed to do?'"

We asked this woman why her husband had been killed. She did not know. "He never got involved in anything," she said, "he was a carpenter. He was not in adult education or anything like that." We asked whether he was a communist. "I don't know what they are," she said, "I am a Catholic. We went to mass every Sunday together."

Second is the statement of María Ramirez Mateo whom we interviewed in La Estancia,

> "I live in the co-operative Augusto Cesar Sandino, in Quilali in the municipality of Nueva Segovia. It's about three to four hours from here. On 18 December 1983 at about 9 o'clock in the morning, I was feeding my children, all six. I rounded them up when I heard shots. We took our kids to a shelter, I couldn't get all the other kids out. One woman was at the river washing and her two kids were killed. The contras killed them in their house. My mother was taking care of them and she was hit in the arm. The contras shot up the whole village and all the houses. They were inside one of the houses. The contras took a girl of about 15. They grabbed the 15 year old girl. The contras were shouting slogans — 'you rabid dogs, why are you running away?'. The girl was a militia, they grabbed her and took away her gun. She was in a special area that had been dug up. She was on one side and I was on the other side, about 30 yards away. She was screaming. She was raped by one of 50 men. There were about 800 contras there, in other areas. The same person then cut her throat with the bayonet that he had in his hand. When I saw her throat cut, I decided I should run away because they would do the same to me. I left for another co-operative. They shot at us but we went down into a gully and escaped. As we did, they began burning houses. About 17 of the 23 houses were burned. Twelve militia were killed, and two little girls. Among the 12 were my two brothers and my father. I remember it as if it happened yesterday. I have only one brother left. My brothers left their wives and children — 3 and 4 children — and they are now orphans. One feels great gratitude when people come and visit us. I want to thank you."

The next person whose statement I will read to the Court is that of Gustavo Adolpho Palaciss Reyes who is 25 years old. We interviewed him in La Estancia on 27 February 1985:

> "I am a day labourer. On 26 December 1984 we were in Sompopera. We were on the road about 6 o'clock in the morning in a Ford pick-up truck, a private pick-up truck. In it were my mother, wife and three family members of my wife's family. None had guns. We heard machine gun fire. We stopped.

It continued for 15 to 20 minutes. It was aimed at the truck. We couldn't see who it was. We all ducked down. When the shooting stopped, they came up to the vehicle. They had a badge on their uniforms that said 'FDN', the uniforms were blue. There were 50 to 80 men. They saw we were six women and four men. They said nothing, they just looked at the bodies. Six had been killed. Of the wounded, one later died. They said nothing. Then they left. My mother and my wife were killed. After the actions of these freedom fighters we got out of the vehicle and found a farm worker to get help. The car had no markings on it. It was a private vehicle of transportation. I just want to say that all this is a product of the help the United States Administration is giving to the contras. I am not a communist, I am a catholic. I hope these words will do something back in the United States. We just want to live in peace."

Q.: What conclusions did you draw about the extent or frequency of acts of terror by the contras?

A.: We concluded that acts of terror occur with some frequency, that they are not isolated incidents. In the period of about one week that we were in Nicaragua, we heard related to us incidents involving 16 murders, 3 cases of torture, 44 kidnappings and one rape. We had the distinct sense that had we stayed longer and sought further evidence, we could have gathered substantial further evidence with little difficulty. In addition, it appeared reasonable to infer that the contras were operating pursuant to a command structure. The contras moved about the countryside frequently in groups of up to several hundred. The individuals who committed acts of terror against civilians were not acting, it seemed to us, as free agents, they were not acting beyond the course and scope of their duties; rather they appeared to be acting pursuant to direction and supervision. Finally, we interviewed a cross-sample of the individuals who had given statements to other investigators, such as Mr. Reid Brody, and those statements checked out, from which we thought it reasonable to infer that, had we interviewed others of the individuals who also had been interviewed by these persons, those statements would likely have checked out. Consequently, our finding was that acts of terror are not isolated incidents but rather occur with some frequency.

Q.: In your interviews with officials of the State Department and with United States Ambassador Harry Bergold in Managua, did you inquire whether the United States Government had ever conducted its own investigation of the contras' activities?

A.: Yes we did and we were told that no such investigation had ever been conducted.

Q.: Did you find out why not?

A.: Yes we did. One of the individuals from the Department of State with whom we spoke, a high-ranking State Department official, spoke with us on the condition that his name not be made public; he asked us not to identify him. He was quite candid with us, I think. He said that the intelligence community had not been tasked to look into these activities, which is to say that the Central Intelligence Agency and other American intelligence services had not been affirmatively directed to undertake to assess the validity of any or all of the allegations that we were referring to.

Q.: Did this senior official tell you anything about the posture or position of the United States Government with respect to these activities?

A.: Yes, he summarized the position of the United States Government quite pithily. He said that the United States Government maintained a posture of "intentional ignorance" — those are his exact words.

Q.: Notwithstanding that posture, did you nevertheless in your meetings with State Department officials in Washington and with United States Ambassador Harry Burgold in Managua find that the United States was in fact aware of acts of terrorism committed by the contras?

A.: Yes, we found that the United States, specifically State Department officials, were aware of acts of terrorism by the contras. This same high ranking State Department official told us that it was clear that the level of atrocities was enormous. Those words "enormous" and "atrocities" were his words.

Q.: From this do you conclude anything about the responsibility of the United States Government for these acts?

A.: Yes, I conclude that the United States Government is responsible for these acts; if the United States Government provides assistance to the contras knowing full well what acts the contras will perform, my conclusion is that the United States Government is responsible. It is like giving a loaded pistol to a person whom you know intends to commit murder.

Mr. REICHLER: Mr. President, that concludes my questioning of the witness; the witness, of course, remains at the disposition of the Court.

QUESTIONS PUT TO PROFESSOR GLENNON BY JUDGE SCHWEBEL

Judge SCHWEBEL: Professor Glennon, I take it that in Nicaragua you were free to travel where you pleased and speak to whomever you wished.' Is that correct?

Mr. GLENNON: That is correct, your Honour.

Q.: Did you speak to figures who have been critical of Sandinistas, such as the Roman Catholic Cardinal?

A.: We did.

Q.: Did your group investigate alleged violation of human rights by the Sandinistas such as the forced relocation of the Miskito Indians, the assassination by State security officials of opposition officials, notably Jorgé Salazar, and the murder of Somoza's supporters who had been taken prisoner?

A.: Justice Schwebel, we regularly asked those persons we interviewed whether they were aware of human rights violations by the Government of Nicaragua and we received no statement that would not constitute hearsay concerning human rights abuses by the Sandinista Government. I would like to say that our sponsors defined the scope of our mission for us; they indicated to us that our primary focus was to be on human rights abuses by the contras and both Donald Fox and I believed that that focus was justified for several reasons. First, a number of groups including the Department of State and Americas Watch, had already studied human rights violations by the Government of Nicaragua; there was a fair amount of literature that already existed on that point. Second, the United States Government was not considering at the time giving assistance to the Government of Nicaragua; the President had requested the Congress again to fund the contras, and the question was the question that our sponsors asked us to look into — what was the responsibility of the United States by virtue of that funding? So I thought that our focus on violations by the contras was entirely justified.

Q.: Wouldn't it be fair to say, Professor Glennon, that you were not tasked, to use the word you used before, to investigate human rights violations of the Sandinistas?

A.: Well, no, our sponsors did tell us to find out what we could about human rights violations by the Sandinistas but it was not the principal purpose of our visit.

Q.: May I ask, Professor Glennon, did you interview officials of the Permanent Commission on Human Rights — I refer now not to the Commission set-up in mid-1980 by the Nicaraguan Government, but to the Commission which was founded in 1977 and which I understand has a distinguished record of protest of alleged violations of human rights, both by the Somoza régime and the Sandinista Government?

A.: Yes, we did.

Q.: Now, I understand that you impute to the United States responsibility for violations of humanitarian law by the contras?

A.: That is right. I view the United States as responsible for the acts that are being carried out by the contras.

Q.: You will have heard news reports about the kidnapping of the daughter of President Duarte of El Salvador after the murder of one of her guards; it was reported that she was pulled away by the hair. Presumably, you have also heard reports of the policy of the insurgents in El Salvador of kidnapping, or assassinating mayors of cities, some 20 of whom have indeed been kidnapped; and there have also been indications of murder of prisoners by El Salvador insurgents — not early in the insurgency but later — and, of course, there is the attack on United States Marines and Salvadoran citizens at an outdoor café which has been referred to in these hearings. Now a leading figure of the insurgents in El Salvador, Mr. Ruben Zamora, is quoted in the International Herald Tribune of 14/15 September on page 3, as denying any knowledge of who had carried out the kidnapping of the Duarte daughter; a denial, incidentally, which he issued from Managua. But, as far as I know, there is no dispute about the attribution of these other actions to El Salvadoran insurgents. Now let us put aside for the time being the question of what is, or has been, the policy or practice of the Nicaraguan Government in regard to support of the insurgency in El Salvador; and let us assume, for the purpose of this question, two facts. First, that the leadership of the El Salvadoran insurgents operates from Nicaragua; and second, that arms have been shipped through Nicaragua to Salvadoran insurgents. If these facts are assumed, wouldn't it follow that Nicaragua is responsible for the violations of humanitarian law to which I have referred?

A.: I really do not feel competent to answer that question. I have no specific first-hand knowledge of events in El Salvador; the knowledge that I possess, which has brought me here to this Court, is as a result of a visit to Nicaragua. I would be glad to answer any questions you may have about information we found in Nicaragua, but I really do not feel competent to answer questions about El Salvador.

Q.: Well, I guess I am questioning you in your capacity as a professor of law, and assuming — as I am sure is the correct assumption — that you have knowledge of the principles of State responsibility and imputability. I am asking you not to speak of the facts of what has occurred in El Salvador: I recognize that is not within the focus of your mission. But I am rather asking you, on the assumption of certain facts, would it follow that, by reason of Nicaragua's aiding — and that is the assumption — of the insurgents in El Salvador, it is responsible for their violation of human rights? Would that follow?

A.: Judge Schwebel, we did not include in our study an analysis of the issues of State responsibility and imputability as part of our mission. Ours was a fact-finding mission and I really would prefer not to comment beyond that.

Q.: May I ask you how you can conclude, if you have not considered questions of imputability, that the United States is responsible for violations of human rights by the contras?

A.: Because the sponsors of our mission asked us to study moral imputability as well as legal imputability. We set out Article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions in our report, but as you can see from our report we did not get into the legal issues. I stand fully behind my conclusion that the United States is responsible for the actions of the contras; I think we meant that primarily in a moral sense, but as I say our mission was directed to finding facts and I am convinced that those facts are solid.

WITNESS CALLED BY THE GOVERNMENT OF NICARAGUA

The PRESIDENT: We continue this morning with the examination of further witnesses, and I have asked the Agent of Nicaragua to have the fourth witness examined.

Mr. ARGÜELLO GÓMEZ: In that case, Mr. President, I would request we call Father Jean Loison, the next witness, and he will be examined by Professor Pellet.

The PRESIDENT: Please summon the fourth witness, Father Jean Loison.

M. PELLET: Avant de poser quelques questions au témoin avec votre autorisation, je pense qu'il doit faire la déclaration prévue à l'article 64 du Règlement.

Père LOISON: Je déclare solennellement en tout honneur et en toute confiance que je dirai la vérité, toute la vérité et rien que la vérité.

Q.: Monsieur, auriez-vous l'obligeance d'indiquer à la Cour votre nom, votre prénom, votre nationalité, la date et le lieu de votre naissance?

R.: Les fonctions que j'exerce actuellement: depuis bientôt trente ans je suis prêtre catholique, et depuis une quinzaine d'années je suis également infirmier. Pour préciser, depuis deux ans je suis professeur dans une école qui forme des infirmières et des infirmiers.

Q.: Vous avez aussi des diplômes d'infirmier?

R.: Oui. J'ai le diplôme d'infirmier que j'ai passé d'abord en Argentine, ensuite, en Argentine aussi, j'ai passé la licence de soins infirmiers. Ensuite j'ai passé en France le diplôme d'infirmier et ensuite fait l'école des cadres infirmiers.

Q.: Et qu'avez-vous fait après Orléans?

R.: Ce que j'ai fait aussitôt après ces neuf ans? Ce n'est pas à Orléans, c'est à Lyon. Je suis parti un an faire une sorte de stage — année passée dans la société des prêtres du Prado. C'est un groupe de prêtres. Je suis du clergé séculier, mais à l'intérieur du clergé séculier il y a certaines familles au point de vue affinités, et moi j'appartiens à la société des prêtres du Prado. C'est une famille sacerdotale qui est plutôt orientée vers les milieux plus défavorisés, vers les milieux pauvres.

Q. : Après ce séjour passé à Lyon, qu'avez-vous fait ?

Q. : Quelles sont les raisons qui vous ont poussé à vous expatrier en Argentine ?

R. : Les raisons ? C'est un peu long. J'avais déjà 35-36 ans, j'avais donc dix ans de sacerdoce et j'étais assez attiré par cette phrase de l'Evangile, ce texte de saint Matthieu au chapitre 25, qui dit que nous serons jugés sur l'amour, l'amour que nous aurons les uns envers les autres. Il y a une phrase qui dit : « J'ai eu faim, vous m'avez donné à manger. » C'est Jésus qui dit cela : « J'étais malade et vous vous êtes occupés de moi. J'étais prisonnier et vous êtes venus me visiter. » J'ai été attiré par cette phrase-là et je me suis dit : « Cela fait déjà dix ans que je suis prêtre et j'ai beaucoup parlé mais peu agi. » A ce même moment j'étais dans un collège, comme je l'ai dit, et mes élèves me disaient : « Ah, vous nous parlez toujours du tiers monde, vous nous parlez toujours des pays sous-développés, mais pourquoi vous n'y allez pas vous-même ? » Alors, cela a été pour moi comme une incitation : « ce que je pense déjà est dans l'Evangile ; c'est la même chose. Mes élèves me voient partir. Pourquoi ne mettrais-je pas en pratique ce que je pense ? » Dans les mêmes moments, le pape Jean XXIII avait demandé qu'il y ait des prêtres occidentaux d'Italie, d'Espagne, de France qui partent en Amérique latine pour aider le clergé qui était insuffisant. Je me souviens très bien avoir vu dans le journal La Croix cet appel de Jean XXIII ; je suis allé quelques heures plus tard voir mon évêque, l'évêque d'Orléans, et je lui ai dit : « C'est comme vous voulez. Si vous voulez répondre à cet appel de Jean XXIII, si vous voulez envoyer des prêtres en Amérique latine, je suis volontaire. » Il m'a dit : « D'accord, dans deux ans, à cette époque-là, je vous y enverrai. »

Q. : Y avait-il des raisons particulières pour que vous alliez en Amérique latine, d'une part, et en Argentine plus particulièrement ?

R. : En Amérique latine. C'est simplement parce que le pape Jean XXIII le demandait. En Argentine ! J'étais volontaire pour n'importe quel pays d'Amérique latine et c'est mon évêque qui m'a dit : « C'est bien de partir mais il faut aussi penser au côté humain. Ce ne serait pas normal que vous partiez dans n'importe quel pays. Il y a déjà un prêtre de votre diocèse qui est, depuis deux ans, en Argentine. Ce serait mieux d'aller faire équipe avec lui. » Et c'est pourquoi cela a été l'Argentine.

Q. : Monsieur l'abbé, combien de temps êtes-vous resté en Argentine et qu'avez-vous fait pendant cette période ?

R. : J'y suis resté dix ans. J'étais prêtre d'abord dans une paroisse de la banlieue de Buenos Aires. Très rapidement, je me suis aperçu que le clergé dans cette banlieue de Buenos Aires, une banlieue où tout le monde était baptisé mais où il y avait beaucoup de déchristianisation, était très coupé de cette population. Je suis allé voir l'évêque d'Avellaneda, dans la banlieue même de Buenos Aires, et lui ai demandé la permission d'apprendre un métier pour pouvoir m'approcher davantage des gens. Il m'a dit : « Oui, si vous le voulez. » Je suis allé alors à l'Université de Buenos Aires où j'ai passé le diplôme d'infirmier. Après avoir obtenu le diplôme d'infirmier, j'ai continué d'être prêtre dans une paroisse et, en même temps, je travaillais de sept heures du matin jusqu'à deux heures de l'après-midi. J'étais infirmier dans un hôpital de Buenos Aires. L'après-midi j'allais à la paroisse, de même que pendant les jours où je ne travaillais pas.

Q. : Vous nous avez dit que vous étiez resté dix ans en Argentine, quand avez-vous quitté ce pays?

R. : J'ai quitté le pays à la fin du mois de février 1976.

Q. : Pour quelle raison?

R. : Parce que mon père était gravement malade, mais il faut dire que mon père n'avait jamais été d'accord pour que je parte en Amérique latine. Il m'avait dit: « Tu ne seras jamais là, je suis sûr que tu ne seras pas là pour mes derniers moments », alors je me suis dit que je voulais absolument être là au moment où la maladie pourrait s'aggraver. Aussi quand ma famille m'a téléphoné et m'a demandé de revenir, ou tout au moins m'a proposé de revenir, j'ai dit oui tout de suite. Malheureusement je suis arrivé quelques heures après sa mort. Et puis, les prêtres français qui partaient en Amérique latine avaient des contrats de cinq ans, et pour moi ça faisait dix ans, donc j'étais à la fin du deuxième contrat de cinq ans et, à quelques mois près, c'était l'époque à laquelle je devais revenir.

Q. : Donc vous êtes resté en France?

R. : Oui, je suis resté en France.

Q. : Combien de temps êtes-vous resté en France après votre retour d'Argentine?

R. : Après mon retour d'Argentine, je suis resté sept ans en France.

Q. : Bien, qu'avez-vous fait pendant cette période de sept années que vous avez passée en France?

R. : Exactement la même chose qu'en Argentine, c'est-à-dire que j'étais prêtre dans une paroisse, la paroisse de Briare à 70 kilomètres à l'est d'Orléans, et j'allais cinq jours par semaine, huit heures par jour à l'hôpital de Gien, à 10 kilomètres de là, où j'étais infirmier.

Q. : Bien, vous avez de nouveau quitté la France après sept ans. Où vous êtes-vous installé?

R. : Je me suis installé au Nicaragua.

Q. : Pourquoi avez-vous choisi le Nicaragua?

R. : C'est parce que j'étais en France quand est revenu un prêtre de Blois que je connaissais, un prêtre qui revenait du Nicaragua où il travaillait; il était à ce moment-là en vacances et c'est comme cela que je l'ai rencontré. Il m'a dit: « Après une expérience de dix ans en Amérique latine, comment toi qui es prêtre et infirmier, qui as des diplômes, comment! tu vas rester en France alors que tu sais bien qu'en Europe il n'y a pas tellement de besoins, pendant qu'en Amérique latine il y a beaucoup de besoins, et moi, qui suis au Nicaragua, je peux t'affirmer qu'on a besoin de cadres et certainement de cadres infirmiers dans ta profession. » Alors à ce moment-là, j'ai dit: « Je vais voir. » C'était en février. Je n'ai pas donné de réponse, je n'avais pas de réponse à lui donner mais je lui ai dit qu'au mois d'août, pendant mes vacances, j'irai au Nicaragua pendant trois semaines pour voir si ça vaut le coup, pour tâter un peu le terrain, je n'avais pas envie de m'embarquer comme ça à l'aveuglette. Alors c'est comme ça que j'ai passé trois semaines au Nicaragua au mois d'août 1982.

Q. : Lorsque vous êtes parti au Nicaragua était-ce avec l'accord des autorités ecclésiastiques françaises?

R. : Bien sûr, oui. J'avais l'accord de mon évêque, Monseigneur Picandet, l'évêque actuel d'Orléans. J'avais l'accord aussi de mes supérieurs et de mes amis de la société des prêtres du Prado de Lyon. J'avais également l'accord de Monseigneur Deroubaix, l'actuel évêque de Saint-Denis près de Paris, et c'est lui

Q. : Monsieur l'abbé, appartenez-vous à une organisation politique?

Q. : Monsieur l'abbé, lorsque vous êtes parti au Nicaragua, à quel endroit vous êtes-vous précisément fixé dans ce pays?

R. : Je me suis fixé à La Trinidad, c'est une petite ville à 25 kilomètres d'Esteli.

M. PELLET: Peut-être que le plus commode serait que vous indiquiez à la Cour où se trouve Esteli; sur la carte qui est derrière vous.

Père LOISON: Là c'est tout le Nicaragua; ici c'est la capitale Managua; Esteli est ici sur la route de Managua à Esteli, à 25 kilomètres avant d'y arriver se trouve La Trinidad, ici.

Q. : Pourquoi vous êtes-vous fixé dans cette ville de La Trinidad?

R. : C'est tout simplement parce que j'y avais passé trois semaines en 1982, au mois d'août. Pendant que je parcourais le pays, je suis allé à Esteli et comme j'étais infirmier je me suis rendu à la DASS, comment dire, le ministère de la santé au point de vue régional, et là j'ai rencontré la responsable infirmière pour toute la région. Elle m'a dit un peu la même chose que mon ami que j'avais vu un an auparavant ou quelques mois auparavant: « Il y a des gens comme vous, vous avez la licence en Argentine, vous êtes en train de faire l'école des cadres en France, eh bien, ce serait dommage que vous ne reveniez pas ici dans cette région! A La Trinidad il y a une école qui forme des infirmiers et infirmières dits universitaires et donc votre place est tout à fait là. » Alors cela m'a fait réfléchir, et puis je lui ai dit oui. Après je suis parti en France pendant un an mais je me suis préparé à cette fonction à laquelle j'étais destiné.

Q. : Pourriez-vous décrire à la Cour les activités qui sont les vôtres à l'heure actuelle au Nicaragua?

R. : Je suis donc dans une école à La Trinidad qui forme des infirmières et des infirmiers. Je donne des cours théoriques, si on peut dire, j'enseigne l'anatomie, la physiologie, la nutrition, la pharmacologie; ça c'est la partie théorique. Au point de vue pratique, je vais aussi à l'hôpital, qui est tout à côté, pour m'occuper des élèves. Je ne soigne pas directement, si, un petit peu si vous voulez, mais principalement mon rôle c'est de former les élèves et donc plutôt de faire soigner que de soigner.

Q. : Combien d'étudiants formez-vous chaque année?

R. : Je m'occupe cette année des « première année », ils sont entre vingt et vingt-cinq. Je m'occupe de la théorie et de la pratique pour les première année et, pour les deuxième année, un groupe de vingt-cinq environ, simplement de la théorie.

Q. : L'école d'infirmiers dans laquelle vous exercez est rattachée à un hôpital, pourriez-vous nous indiquer quelle est la nature des soins qui sont dispensés dans cet hôpital et le genre de patients que vous êtes amené à soigner?

R. : C'est un hôpital chirurgical. Donc, ce sont tous des patients qui ont besoin d'être opérés. Ou tout au moins qui sont opérables. Je crois qu'on y voit des opérations d'appendicite ou de vésicule biliaire, si vous voulez, toutes les opérations banales. Et puis toutes les opérations qui relèvent de la guerre, alors là, je pourrais citer des cas infinis, des cas d'amputation, par exemple des mains, des jambes; la mâchoire éclatée; aussi, il n'y a pas très longtemps, un monsieur qui avait les testicules éclatés; une dame dont on voyait tout l'abdomen et qui était enceinte d'un certain nombre de semaines et j'ai vu l'enfant déchiqueté. Alors ce sont des blessures de guerre sur ce genre de patients; il faudrait ajouter aussi que ce genre de patients ce sont tous ceux qui n'ont rien à voir avec la guerre mais il y a aussi tous ceux qui ont à voir quelque chose avec la guerre, là je pense aux militaires, aux civils qui défendent leur coopérative, leur lieu de travail. Je crois même que ce sont les plus touchés, les plus visés par la contre-révolution. Et puis, il y a aussi tous ceux qui sont sans défense. Je me souviens, il y a quinze jours (je suis sûr qu'elle est encore à l'hôpital), d'une petite Martha de sept ans qui a reçu une balle dans le coude gauche. Je pense aussi à Maria Lucia, une petite fille de cinq ans: la pauvre était à l'hôpital avec sa mère; je me souviens que mes élèves avaient fait la quête pour cette petite Maria Lucia et pour sa mère, qui avait perdu ses quatre frères et sœurs qui avaient été tués dans une attaque à San Gregorio à 20 kilomètres de Quilali. Si vous voulez, Esteli est ici et j'ai eu l'occasion de parcourir la région qui est là, à l'est et au nord-est d'Esteli. C'est dans cette région que la petite Maria Lucia a été blessée. Je me souviens aussi d'une dame d'une quarantaine d'années, du côté d'Ocotal: elle marchait dans un chemin et quelqu'un a sauté sur une mine, et elle-même, qui était à quelques mètres de là, a reçu des éclats d'obus sur tout le côté gauche du corps et dans la vessie; je me souviens l'avoir soignée.

Q.: Monsieur l'abbé, en dehors de votre travail d'infirmier, d'une part, et de professeur, d'autre part, avez-vous l'occasion de vous déplacer dans la région de La Trinidad?

Q.: En quelles occasions?

R.: J'habite La Trinidad et je connais un peu les alentours de La Trinidad. Je gravis la montagne de temps en temps. J'aime bien le sport et il y a quelques communautés qui sont là, tout à côté de La Trinidad. Mais je suis allé à Ocotal aussi. Et à Esteli — j'habite Esteli —, le samedi et le dimanche, je vais voir des amis. Autour d'Esteli, j'ai eu l'occasion de voyager, comme autour de La Trinidad et un peu plus loin, ici, à Ocotal, j'ai passé toute une semaine avec un prêtre de mes amis, je l'aidais. Et puis dans cette région, ici, du côté de San Juan del Rio Coco, j'ai passé plusieurs semaines à la cueillette du café. Et plus loin, ici, la région de Quilali est la région dans laquelle je suis allé plusieurs fois parce qu'au Nicaragua il y a des campagnes de vaccination trois fois par an et, comme je suis au Nicaragua depuis deux ans, j'ai participé six fois à des campagnes de vaccination; chaque fois nous partons avec les élèves pendant deux ou trois jours. Six fois donc, je suis allé deux ou trois jours dans toute la région d'Esteli, en particulier dans la région de Quilali que, finalement, je commence à connaître.

Q.: Bien. Cette région que vous commencez à connaître, auriez-vous, Monsieur l'abbé, l'obligeance d'indiquer à la Cour quelles sont ses caractéristiques du point de vue à la fois géographique, économique et en ce qui concerne son peuplement?

R.: Oui. D'un point de vue géographique, c'est une région montagneuse, avec de belles vallées. Mais il faut dire aussi que c'est une région, comme on peut le voir sur la carte, tout près du Honduras. J'ai calculé plusieurs fois: Esteli est à peu près à 50 kilomètres du Honduras à vol d'oiseau; par la route, elle est à 80 ou 90 kilomètres. Maintenant, d'un point de vue économique, un peu avant d'arriver à Ocotal, c'est la plaine de Sébaco, une plaine très fertile où l'on cultive du riz. A partir de La Trinidad, et plus au nord à Esteli, et à l'est, on trouve de belles cultures de maïs, des cultures de haricots rouges; à l'est, dans la région d'Esteli, beaucoup de cultures de pommes de terre aussi. Puis, surtout, comme je l'ai évoqué tout à l'heure, on trouve dans le nord beaucoup de café: c'est une région importante pour la culture du café. Il y a aussi beaucoup de bétail.

Q. : En ce qui concerne le peuplement ?

R. : La ville où j'habite, La Trinidad, compte 8000 habitants environ, un peu comme la ville de Quilali que j'ai citée. La ville d'Ocotal, peut-être 20 000 habitants, et la capitale, Esteli, 40 000 habitants environ. Il faut parler aussi des paysans. Une partie est dispersée, mais, depuis quelques années, une autre partie est regroupée car, à cause de toutes les incursions de la contra, le gouvernement a voulu les protéger. Il y a donc maintenant un certain nombre de paysans regroupés dans des petits villages.

Q. : Monsieur l'abbé, pourriez-vous décrire cette zone comme une zone d'opérations des contras ?

R. : Du côté de La Trinidad, je ne peux pas dire que le danger est permanent ni dans la ville même d'Esteli, mais à l'est d'Esteli et au nord, c'est une zone qui est pour ainsi dire une zone permanente de danger.

Q. : Monsieur l'abbé, pensez-vous être en mesure de répondre à des questions concernant les méthodes de combat de la contra ?

R. : Oui, j'ai certains éléments qui me permettent de répondre.

Q. : Quels sont ces éléments ou plus précisément quelle connaissance avez-vous de ces méthodes ?

R. : J'ai des connaissances par les blessures que je vois tous les jours. Par les blessés qui me racontent un peu ce que sont ces méthodes. Et aussi par les réfugiés. Il y a un mois et demi environ, il y avait des réfugiés à Llano Largo, une petite communauté à l'est de La Trinidad ; il y a eu aussi quatre-vingts ou une centaine de réfugiés à l'école de La Trinidad, que j'ai vus et avec lesquels j'ai parlé. Moi-même, comme je vous l'ai dit, j'ai parcouru la région et j'ai pu voir beaucoup de destructions.

Q. : Monsieur l'abbé, à partir de ces éléments, pourriez-vous décrire à l'intention de la Cour ce que vous savez de ces méthodes de combat des contras ?

R. : Je dirais d'abord qu'ils ne recherchent jamais l'affrontement. C'est une caractéristique. Je crois que tous ceux qui ont eu à combattre contre les contras disent tous qu'ils attaquent, mais toujours par surprise et en essayant de ne jamais avoir d'affrontements. Ensuite, je dirais qu'ils tâchent de brûler et de détruire et ils sont toujours en surnombre. Chaque fois que l'on parle avec quelqu'un d'une coopérative, il nous dit qu'ils sont arrivés à deux cents ou trois cents alors qu'eux n'étaient que quinze ou vingt. Je me souviens, à côté de Quilali, dans une petite coopérative, ils m'ont dit : « nous étions neuf membres mais cinq étaient mobilisés, donc nous n'étions que quatre. Ils sont venus à deux au trois cents. Ils nous ont attaqués en pleine nuit. »

Q. : Précisons une chose en ce qui concerne ces méthodes. Avez-vous constaté ou avez-vous entendu dire que les contras ont fait porter leurs attaques sur des populations civiles ?

R. : Oui. J'aurais plusieurs exemples à raconter. A côté de Quilali, à une trentaine de kilomètres à l'est de Quilali, il y avait un petit village qui s'appelait El Coco. Les contras sont arrivés, ils ont tout ravagé, tout détruit, tout brûlé. Ils sont arrivés dans une petite maison et l'ont mitraillée sans faire attention s'il y avait des gens à l'intérieur. Deux enfants qui, par peur, s'étaient cachés sous un lit ont été atteints. Je pourrais dire la même chose d'un homme et d'une femme qui ont été atteints dans la petite coopérative de Zacarías Olivas. La même chose. Ils s'étaient mis au lit aussi par peur. A la différence de El Coco, les contras venaient d'attaquer, de soutenir un combat et ils étaient en fuite. Etant en fuite, ils sont entrés dans une maison et, voyant que des gens étaient là, ils ont lancé une grenade. L'homme et la femme sont morts et un des enfants a été blessé.

Tout près de là — c'était à Panali —, je me souviens encore, deux personnes différentes m'ont dit que: « Là ici dans le petit village, il y avait un invalide. En passant par là, ils l'ont tué. » Je me souviens avoir demandé, mais pourquoi? « Simplement, par plaisir. » J'ai parlé aussi avec José Francisco. C'est quelqu'un qui a été séquestré pendant six mois. Il m'a dit qu'il a vu deux femmes avoir été égorgées devant lui. Ces deux femmes avaient été violées et après, les contras leur ont dit: « Maintenant qu'allez-vous dire? Vous allez dire que nous sommes des méchants, vous allez nous dénoncer. Pour que vous n'ayez pas à parler, on va vous égorger. » Elles ont dit: « Non. De grâce, ne nous tuez pas! » A ce moment-là, ils leur ont mis un torchon sur la bouche, ils ont pris un grand couteau et ils les ont égorgées. Je dirais que c'est le crime systématique. Tout à l'heure, j'évoquais tous les gens qui défendent leurs coopératives, ce sont ceux-là qui sont souvent la cible des attaques. Je pense aussi à celui qui avait des fonctions d'ambulancier à Telpaneca. C'est un petit village à une trentaine de kilomètres de San Juan del Río Coco. Là, il y avait un monsieur qui faisait fonction d'ambulancier. C'était un vendredi, le jour où arrivaient les élèves de mon école pour aider aux vaccinations. Ce jour-là, ils sont arrivés avec la nouvelle que celui qui faisait fonction d'ambulancier avait été tué dans une embuscade. Au moment de l'embuscade, tous les brigadistes ont sauté du camion et le chauffeur a dit: « Non. La voiture est à mon frère. Moi je reste dans la voiture et vais discuter avec eux. » Il n'y a pas eu moyen de discuter. Au moment où les contras sont arrivés, ils l'ont tué.

Q.: Monsieur l'abbé, vous avez largement anticipé sur la question suivante que je pensais vous poser. Avez-vous constaté ou avez-vous entendu dire que les contras pratiquent la torture ou infligent des mutilations?

R.: Je l'ai entendu dire plus que je l'ai vu. Quand les contras torturent, en général ils achèvent leurs victimes; mais elles se déduisent facilement quand on retrouve des cadavres. Par exemple, le cadavre de José Elias Gutierrez qui habitait Los Carbonales, tout à côté de La Trinidad. On l'a retrouvé avec sur le cou des marques de strangulation, avec la poitrine complètement broyée. Il y avait certains os qui étaient également broyés. C'est assez souvent que j'ai entendu parler de gens qui avaient les yeux crevés, arrachés à la baïonnette, et je crois surtout de préférence pour tous ceux qui participent de près ou de loin au processus de la révolution. Je pense à un étudiant en médecine de León qui était dans le petit village d'El Coco, que j'ai cité tout à l'heure, et à qui on a coupé les deux bras et arraché les yeux. Je pense à Julio Tercero, c'était un employé de la radio Segovia à Ocotal. Le dimanche où ils sont entrés à Ocotal, ils ont voulu détruire la radio et, en entrant dans la pièce où se trouvait Julio Tercero, ils l'ont pris, lui ont arraché les yeux, lui ont ouvert le ventre et les intestins en sont sortis. J'ai même une photo à la disposition de la Cour où l'on voit Julio Tercero calciné mais on voit les intestins qui sont sortis. Les gens sont achevés. Camilo Garcia est un ami infirmier que je connais, il a eu de la chance parce qu'il n'est resté dans leurs mains que quelques heures. C'était le jour de l'attaque de La Trinidad et, comme les contras avaient attaqué par surprise, ils croyaient parler avec un membre de l'armée nicaraguayenne. Les contras l'ont abordé et lui croyait que c'était des soldats de l'armée nicaraguayenne. Ils lui ont dit: « Toi, tu es un petit chien. » (Au Nicaragua, il y a une expression sympathique pour désigner les militaires, pour désigner ceux qui défendent le pays. On les appelle les « petits chiens de Sandino ».) Les gens de la contra l'ont abordé et lui ont dit: « Mais tu n'as pas affaire à un petit chien de Sandino, tu as affaire à un petit chien de Reagan. » A ce moment-là, ils lui ont envoyé un bon coup de poing dans le ventre au point qu'il est tombé à terre. Après, ils lui ont dit: « Qu'est-ce que tu fais?» Il a répondu qu'il était infirmier. A ce moment-là, ils ont pris les deux canons de fusil et les lui ont collés ici. Il a encore des brûlures un mois et demi après. Je suis sûr qu'à cette heure-ci il a encore tout le cou brûlé.

R.: Je dirais que les séquestres sont une des raisons pour lesquelles une partie des paysans sont regroupés. Si vous voulez, ici, se trouve Quilali. De Quilali à Wiwili, dans cette région-là, au nord, il ne reste pratiquement plus de paysans en âge de porter les armes parce qu'ils ont tous été séquestrés. Je me souviens aussi de Avelino Lopez, avec qui j'ai parlé il n'y a pas très longtemps, qui est resté ligoté pendant vingt-quatre heures; de Camilo Garcia que j'ai déjà cité. Je pourrais parler aussi de voyageurs qui, le jour de l'attaque de La Trinidad, partaient en bus pour le Guatemala ou le Mexique. Ce bus a été brûlé. Les contras l'ont arrêté pendant l'attaque, l'ont brûlé; les gens sont descendus et ont été emmenés, mais grâce à l'arrivée de l'aviation sandiniste, ils ont pu s'échapper. Je pense aussi à cette jeune fille qui vivait à La Vigía, une petite communauté à côté de Quilali, que j'ai rencontrée à l'occasion de mon activité professionnelle. Elle avait été enlevée pendant six mois et est revenue avec une maladie vénérienne; elle expliquait comment elle avait servi de prostituée pendant ces six mois. Je pense aussi à José Francisco, du côté de La Venecia, pas très loin de Condega, au nord-est d'Esteli. Ce jeune garçon de dix-sept ans a été séquestré pendant également cinq ou six mois au Honduras et il me racontait qu'il est resté avec les deux mains attachées derrière le dos. Même pour faire ses besoins physiologiques, il avait les mains attachées, il n'a jamais pu prendre de bain. Il avait vu au Honduras des femmes d'un certain âge et des enfants et les contras disaient que ces gens-là ne servent à rien et qu'il valait mieux les envoyer dans des centres de réfugiés. Il avait vu, dans les premières heures de sa séquestration, le viol de deux jeunes filles qui ont été égorgées. Il disait aussi qu'il avait des amis au Honduras, mais on n'avait pas confiance en lui car on pensait qu'il allait s'échapper. Il y avait cinq Nord-Américains qui entraînaient les autres personnes, mais pas lui car il n'était pas de confiance. J'ai à la disposition de la Cour le récit sur cassette de ces six mois passés au Honduras. On est aussi sans nouvelles des frères Rugama de la région de Quibuto. Ils ont été séquestrés et leurs parents n'ont aucune nouvelle depuis plusieurs mois. Chaque fois que l'on va dans un de ces villages de réfugiés ou que l'on parle à des gens qui font partie de coopératives ou qui ont été attaqués, ils nous disent que chaque fois il y a des morts, des blessés et des séquestrés. C'est systématique. Je me souviens encore maintenant de Luis Siles, que j'ai rencontré à San Bartolo, et qui m'a dit qu'il a été séquestré, mais, s'étant échappé, ils ont voulu se venger: ils ont enlevé sa fille de quinze ans. A El Jobo, à côté de Quilali, il y a deux jeunes filles d'à peine quatorze ans qui ont été séquestrées il y a quelques semaines.

Q.: Monsieur l'abbé, répondant à ma question sur les méthodes de la contra, vous avez donné un certain nombre d'indications, avez-vous constaté ou avez-vous entendu dire que l'armée nicaraguayenne pratique les mêmes méthodes?

R.: Non, et ce serait surprenant de la part d'un gouvernement qui, dans ses premières décisions, a supprimé la peine de mort. Je vois mal comment un gouvernement pourrait après cela ordonner à ses soldats de pratiquer les mêmes méthodes. Je crois qu'il y aurait comme une contradiction.

Q.: Vous croyez ou vous savez?

Q. : Merci. Vous avez évoqué tout à l'heure l'attaque de La Trinidad, est-ce que vous pourriez indiquer à la Cour dans quelles conditions s'est faite cette attaque et à quel moment ?

R. : Le 1er août 1985, il y a un mois et demi tout juste. C'était à cinq heures du matin, il faisait encore à peine jour, et les contras étaient déguisés en soldats de l'armée sandiniste. Il était impossible de reconnaître qui était qui. Ils ont attaqué mais d'une manière sélective. Ils ont voulu attaquer le centre de santé qu'ils ont manqué en partie, et ils ont aussi attaqué l'endroit où se trouvaient les responsables sandinistes. Plusieurs personnes à La Trinidad m'ont dit qu'ils demandaient des noms précis, par exemple le responsable du front sandiniste pour La Trinidad. Ils ont demandé le nom du responsable des présidents de quartier et ils l'ont obtenu. Il se rendait à son bureau lorsqu'il a été tué. Ils recherchaient aussi le curé de La Trinidad. Pendant ce temps, ils ont brûlé le bus d'évangélistes qui se rendaient au Guatemala comme je l'ai déjà dit et ils ont attaqué avec une roquette (j'ai une photographie que je tiens à la disposition de la Cour) un grand silo à maïs qui est maintenant éventré. Puis tout le silo a pris feu, détruisant un petit moteur de ventilation et un hangar où étaient entreposés des haricots rouges. Je ne crois pas que ce soit utile à la Cour mais, si elle le désire, j'ai des haricots rouges calcinés à sa disposition ainsi que des sacs brûlés.

Q. : Monsieur l'abbé, repartons en arrière dans les questions que je vous ai posées. Répondant à l'une de mes premières questions, vous avez indiqué que vous avez été amené à effectuer de très nombreux déplacements dans la région de La Trinidad et d'Esteli, pourriez-vous indiquer brièvement à la Cour ce que vous avez constaté à ces occasions ?

R. : J'ai constaté des spectacles qui m'ont souvent ému. Je commence par celui qui m'a peut-être le plus ému parce que j'y avais vécu une des plus belles expériences de ma vie au Nicaragua, c'était lorsque j'avais fait la cueillette du café. Je suis retourné à La Ilusion, c'est à côté de San Juan del Río Coco, et j'ai vu que toute l'exploitation de café avait été détruite. Cela m'a fait mal au cœur. Mal au cœur aussi d'apprendre que, le jour du 1er janvier, nous avions fait une petite célébration liturgique dans la maison d'un paysan qui avait joué de la guitare au cours de cet office. J'ai appris qu'il avait été tué. Il faudrait parler également du spectacle hallucinant d'El Coco que j'ai évoqué tout à l'heure quand je suis arrivé sur cette plaine. Il restait quelques maisons sur le côté. Au milieu c'était une plaine où il ne restait simplement debout que les latrines et puis deux tracteurs complètement calcinés. Je crois que c'est un souvenir qui est ineffaçable. Puis il y a quelque temps aussi à Llano Largo, je crois que c'est trois ou quatre jours avant l'attaque de La Trinidad. Ils ont attaqué Llano Largo (c'est une petite communauté) et là, ils ont brûlé l'école, ils ont brûlé l'épicerie où il y avait les grains, le ravitaillement pour la commune. Je me souviens des gens qui m'accompagnaient pendant que je regardais le désastre, ils me disaient : « Regardez-ça : c'est la maison de Téodoro, c'est un pauvre vieux, on se demande vraiment pourquoi ils lui ont brûlé sa maison ! » Il faudrait parler de toutes les coopératives, la coopérative d'El Coco j'en ai parlé mais la coopérative Los Carbonales, celle de Caulatú, les exploitations de café d'Ocotal, d'Oroverde, de San José, de San Lucas, de San Jerónimo et puis les réserves de grain. Je crois que partout, chaque fois qu'ils attaquent une coopérative, ils vont directement aux réserves de grain, aussi bien à Caulatú, à La Palmera, à Quibuto et puis les réserves de grain pour la ville, je l'ai dit tout à l'heure pour La Trinidad, mais ils ont fait la même chose à San Juan del Río Coco, ils ont fait la même chose aussi à Ocotal. J'ai aussi les photos à la disposition de la Cour au cas où elle le désirerait. Puis à Puertas Azules, à côté d'Esteli, ce n'est pas du maïs mais des pommes de terre qu'ils ont détruites. Ils ont également détruit l'école et le centre de santé. Enfin pour être bien sûr que tout soit détruit, avant de détruire le centre de santé, ils avaient sorti tous les médicaments dehors et puis ils les ont brûlés. Alors vous me demandez ça, mais pour moi, j'ai le souvenir d'un nombre considérable de tôles tordues, de poutres calcinées, si vous voulez, sans compter les camions ou les tracteurs qui ont été victimes d'embuscades et qui ont été brûlés.

Q. : Vous avez décrit des faits, Monsieur l'abbé, jusqu'à présent. Est-ce que pour terminer vous pourriez indiquer quels sont, d'après vous, les effets et les objectifs de cet ensemble de pratiques?

R. : On voit tout de suite les effets quand on voit qu'il y a eu des écoles ou des centres de formation pour adultes où des maîtres d'école ont été séquestrés par exemple, quand il y a des centres de santé, quand ce sont les outils de travail comme des tracteurs, des camions, tout cela montre déjà des effets mais je dirais aussi toute une paralysie des activités. Ainsi, il y a dix jours, quand j'ai pris l'avion pour venir ici en Europe, j'ai mis une heure et demie de plus parce que le pont qui se trouve à côté de La Trinidad avait été détruit un mois et demi auparavant, il est reconstruit mais il n'est pas encore assez sec pour que les véhicules puissent y passer, alors il y a un misérable petit chemin de déviation et il y a des embouteillages, il est donc impossible de passer par là. Et puis dans la région de San Juan de Quilali, là aussi, ce n'est pas rentable de passer sur ces chemins parce qu'on n'a pas le droit de s'y aventurer avant 9 heures du matin, ni après 3 heures de l'après-midi. Vous rendez-vous compte qu'entre 9 heures du matin et 2 ou 3 heures de l'après-midi il n'y a que quelques heures. Dans cette même zone de Quilali, de San Bartolo où y a des villages où les enfants, les paysans sont dispersés dans cette région, il y a des zones où les enfants ne vont plus à l'école, les gens ne vont plus au centre de santé. Alors tout cela est une paralysie des activités. Il faudrait aussi parler du nombre de gens qui sont amputés, ou qui sont invalides pour la vie. Et puis moi, comme professeur aussi, je voudrais souligner le nombre d'élèves qui sont marqués psychologiquement. Je me souviens, un lundi matin, je faisais des reproches à des élèves parce qu'elles n'avaient pas très bien réussi leur examen, mais elles m'ont dit: « Nous, nous étions à Ocotal et nous avons été attaquées; comment vouliez-vous que nous passions toute notre journée de dimanche à reviser notre examen? C'était impossible, nous avions peur que les contras reviennent d'un moment à l'autre. » Puis, je pense aussi, aux conséquences et aux effets psychologiques. Je me souviens d'une dame à Quibuto qui me disait: « J'ai les nerfs malades, moi, maintenant n'importe quel bruit me fait peur, m'agace, ainsi que ma famille et mes voisins. » Alors le nombre de gens marqués par cette guerre est très grand. Je voudrais signaler aussi le nombre de gens que l'on empêche d'agir, je veux dire que la dissuasion marche bien, dans ce sens, que c'est certainement une méthode des contras que d'employer la dissuasion pour que petit à petit les gens ne prennent plus autant de responsabilités. Je crois que c'est quelque chose qui est payant dans le sens négatif si vous voulez, quand ils tuent, par exemple, les responsables d'une municipalité. Il y a également un monsieur qui me disait dans la région de Panali: « Moi, ils m'en voulaient parce que je faisais partie d'organisations et je me suis présenté aux élections », alors je crois qu'il y a dissuasion aussi. « Ils ont détruit ma maison parce que j'étais responsable d'un comité de quartier », par exemple, un autre me disait cela. Ou, à Puertas Azules on brûle plus de dix maisons, ensuite les gens dans le secteur n'ont plus envie de faire partie d'une coopérative. Justement des gens qui étaient à Puertas Azules il y en avait un qui me disait, un qui était séquestré d'ailleurs: « Nous étions dix-sept membres dans cette coopérative et puis maintenant nous ne sommes plus que trois, nous avons atterri dans une coopérative voisine et au lieu de dix-sept nous ne sommes plus que trois, vous voyez, les quatorze autres ont peur et ils sont dissuadés de participer d'une manière nouvelle.» Puis, j'évoquerai le climat de terreur, c'est un climat de terreur qui est très grand et puis qui est communicatif. Comment voulez-vous? Pourquoi à El Coco par exemple, après avoir tué et même violé une jeune fille, Maria Santos, qui avait seize ans je crois, pourquoi après avoir fait cela, ils l'ont coupée en plusieurs morceaux et ont répandu ceux-ci? Puis un des cas qui m'a fait le plus horreur, j'en suis encore ému. C'était au moment de la cueillette du café, l'année dernière au mois de décembre, il y avait tout un camion de postiers qui s'en allait à San Juan del Rio Coco pour aller faire la cueillette du café et, je me souviens, à l'intérieur, il y avait plusieurs postiers que je connaissais, un monsieur qui s'appelait Briones, et une dame qui était la postière de mon quartier, Carmela Davila, et qui m'avait donné plusieurs fois le téléphone pour mes communications téléphoniques. On a su, et tout le monde a été horrifié dans la région, que ce petit camion avait été victime d'une embuscade; il y avait eu un tir de mortier et le camion n'a pas pu suivre; il y avait des blessés et peut-être même des morts à l'intérieur de la camionnette. Les contras sont montés dans la camionnette, ont arraché certains vêtements, les papiers d'identité et l'argent, et ils ont arrosé les gens d'essence et ceux-ci ont pris feu. Je parcourais encore, il n'y a pas très longtemps, le chemin où l'on voit ce qui reste du camion calciné de ces postiers qui ont été brûlés vifs.

Q.: Je vous remercie, Monsieur l'abbé. Monsieur le Président, je n'ai pas d'autres questions à poser au témoin et je remercie très vivement la Cour de son attention.

QUESTIONS PUT TO FATHER LOISON BY JUDGE SCHWEBEL

Judge SCHWEBEL: Father, did I understand you to say that the death penalty had been abolished in Nicaragua?

Père LOISON: Que la peine de mort était abolie au Nicaragua? Oui. Je crois que c'est une des premières décisions en 1979, mais je ne peux pas vous donner la date exacte.

Q.: Father, in your view does it follow that if the Government proclaims the abolition of the death penalty it necessarily abstains from killing its opponents outside of combat? Do you think a proclamation of law equates with practice?

R.: De tuer ses ennemis au moment d'une guerre, je pense que c'est normal de se défendre. Je crois que le Gouvernement nicaraguayen a l'intention de se défendre. Je pense que ça va dans le même sens qu'abolir la peine de mort. Ils tuent mais ce n'est pas pour le plaisir de tuer; je n'ai jamais constaté la volonté de tuer de la part du Gouvernement nicaraguayen. Ce que je sais, c'est qu'ils ont le seul désir de se défendre des attaques de la contre-révolution.

Q.: Father, I was not referring to defence in the course of combat but killing outside of combat. Have you heard of the killings of former members of the National Guard who were held in jail after the revolution — have you heard of that?

R.: Oui, j'ai entendu dire qu'il y avait d'anciens membres de la garde nationale qui ont été détenus. Je crois qu'il y a des prisonniers dans certaines prisons nicaraguayennes. Il y en a une, que je n'ai pas visitée, à l'entrée d'Esteli, et je crois qu'il y a des contre-révolutionnaires qui y sont prisonniers.

Q.: Father, I was not referring to whether National Guard members were simply held in prison, but whether they had been killed while having been held in prison. Such charges were made to the Nicaraguan Permanent Commission on Human Rights.

R.: A ma connaissance, non. Je n'en ai pas entendu parler. Ça m'étonnerait beaucoup mais je n'ai pas d'éléments pour répondre.

Q.: Yes. Permit me to read out to you, Father, the following passages from a book by Miss Shirley Christian, entitled Nicaragua: Revolution in the Family. This book was written by a reporter who spent extended periods of time in Nicaragua and widely interviewed Nicaraguans of various persuasions.

> "The FSLN repeatedly said that it did not plan to take reprisals against former National Guardsmen and others identified with the old order but the headquarters of the Permanent Commission for Human Rights was soon jammed with people concerned about jailed or missing relatives. They, that is the Government, did not deny all abuses and generally get high marks in sympathy internationally for good intentions on human rights. However, a subsequent report by the Permanent Commission for Human Rights said executions and disappearances of people had occurred in significant numbers from the victory through October 1979. It said at least 43 people were killed by military or security forces in those early months and that people had come to the Commission offices to inform them of the disappearance of more than 600 people during the first year — mostly peasants and labourers from outside the capital."

Some allegations of this kind are elaborated in the following pages — I have read from page 132 and page 133. I might also point out, Father, that the Director of the Permanent Commission on Human Rights

"met with Pope John Paul II and told him that Nicaragua had 8,000 political prisoners, mostly former National Guardsmen, and that about 800 people had disappeared or been killed for political reasons since the Sandinistas came to power, most in the first few months of the regime" (ibid., p. 281).

Do you have any comment on those allegations?

R.: Monsieur le juge, ce que j'ai à dire c'est que je n'ai pas connaissance de cas de ce genre mais, même sans avoir connaissance, je pense que ce sont tout d'abord des chiffres qui me paraissent énormes et en tout cas je suis absolument sûr que le gouvernement lui-même n'a jamais donné d'ordre dans ce sens-là. Et que si, par hasard, il y a eu des erreurs, je crois qu'elles doivent venir de gens subalternes, mais je suis sûr qu'il n'y a eu aucun ordre dans ce sens-là. C'est ce que je crois.

Q.: Father, have you heard of Jorgé Salazar? Do you know who he was?

R.: Non, je ne connais pas, excusez-moi.

Judge SCHWEBEL: That concludes my questions, Mr. President.

The Court rose at 11.10 a.m.

TWENTY-FIRST PUBLIC SITTING (17 IX 85, 3.15 p.m.)

WITNESS CALLED BY THE GOVERNMENT OF NICARAGUA

Mr. ARGÜELLO GÓMEZ: I would like the Court to call our next witness, Mr. William Huper. I shall conduct the examination myself.

The PRESIDENT: I summon Mr. William Huper, the Minister of Finance of Nicaragua.

Mr. ARGÜELLO GÓMEZ: Mr. President, I would like to start by requesting Mr. Huper to read the declaration before him.

Mr. HUPER: I solemnly declare upon my honour and conscience that I will speak the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth.

Q.: Mr. Huper, will you please state your full name?

A.: My name is William Huper.

Q.: When and where were you born?

A.: I was born in Managua, Nicaragua, on 12 October 1949.

Q.: Will you please tell the Court where you received your education?

A.: I have a Bachelor's degree in Social Science, with a major in History from the National University of Nicaragua, and later I went to Graduate School of Political Economics in Mexico, during which time I was also a teacher in Economics, at the National University.

Q.: You are presently the Minister of Finance of the Republic of Nicaragua?

A.: Yes.

Q.: When did you take up this appointment?

A.: In January 1985.

Q.: Would you tell the Court what positions you held previously?

A.: I have served continuously since the beginning of the revolution as Vice-Minister of Finance.

Q.: It is understood that this is up to the time when you were appointed Minister?

A.: Yes, until last January.

Q.: Would you describe the precise scope of your responsibilities both as Minister of Finance and, earlier on, as Vice-Minister?

A.: In doing my duties, I am responsible for the planning of fiscal policies in Nicaragua and I am also a full member of different Commissions at Cabinet level in Nicaragua, which are in charge of defining different economic policies and also are responsible for the making of the annual programme. I have also served as a representative of my country in the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund meetings and also in different meetings at the regional level in Central America.

Q.: Is it correct that your experience and expertise include the problems of development economics?

A.: Nicaragua is an under-developed country, or as it is commonly called a developing country. This means that Nicaragua is a country with a very fragile infrastructure and a high dependence on the international economic trends. One of our main goals in our political economic strategy has been to improve the standard of living of our population through, for example, the construction of schools, medical posts and another has been to strengthen our economy through new investments. These are problems directly related to the carrying out of development economics which, in the case of Nicaragua, has been done in a very difficult context due to the aggression.

Q.: Could you please outline the nature of the economic damage which has been caused by the military and paramilitary operations against Nicaragua?

A.: Military and paramilitary operations in and against Nicaragua have affected everything; from human life to schools; from material damages due to sabotage to the coffee production. The war has affected all our economic and social order in Nicaragua.

Q.: Could you please explain when this economic damage first manifested itself?

A.: There were some hostile activities against Nicaragua in the last months of 1980, that affected the fishery industry due to the hijacking of boats.

Q.: In what period or periods has the incidence of damage been particularly severe?

A.: There have been different times and also different types of damage. The most severe damage occurred during 1984. During 1984, we estimate that the overall impact of the war on our economy rose to an estimated 175 per cent of the total export earnings. During 1984 production losses due to the war have been estimated at about 40 per cent of total export income. I think it is important to indicate that besides this type of economic damage there is another which is accumulative. It means that there is a bigger impact as time goes on. There is for example economic damage due to the financing of different activities in Nicaragua, production losses also have an accumulative impact on the economy as also do project delays. All of which reduces the standard of living of our population.

Q.: Going from the general economic damage to more particular type of damage, could I ask you to describe the loss of production caused by the hostile activities?

A.: In order to describe the losses of production, I have here with me a report made by the Economic Commission for Latin America. This is a report which analyses the performance of the Nicaraguan economy in 1984. In its estimation, the overall impact between 1981 and 1984 due to production losses, is a little higher than US$300 million. This sum is 75 per cent of our total export earnings from 1984. For production losses in this report the concept includes losses due to the inability to collect crops; the inability to process production and also losses due to the inability to develop production projects, or because of delays in production-related projects.

Q.: To put things in perspective, could you please give the Court some estimate or figures as to particular losses in production in coffee production or in any other type of activity?

A.: For example, during the harvests of 1983-1984 and 1984-1985, coffee production suffered losses totalling US$70 million. This is about 12 per cent of our total earnings coming from exports during those years. It is also about 35 per cent of our total export earnings from coffee production, during that period.

Q.: You have been referring to a report by the Economic Commission for Latin America, would you please explain to the Court the status of that report?

A.: This is a report prepared by a specialized agency of the United Nations that is the Economic Commission for Latin America. This Commission provides assistance to all Latin American countries and they annually make a report on each of the Latin American countries. In the case of this note to which I have referred, it describes the trends in our economy during the past seven years. They also evaluated the performance of our economy during 1984 and finally reached some conclusions and made a prognosis for the Nicaraguan economy. In this document there is a chapter in which the Commission analysed the impact of the aggression in certain fields of economic activity in Nicaragua.

Q.: Is it the case that the economic loss caused includes the cost of rehabilitating damaged production units and capital goods generally?

A.: I assume that this refers to damage to capital goods such as trucks, vessels, bridges, schools, medical posts, production machinery and, let us say for example, the maintenance of roads, and that also includes material damages, for example, damages in spare parts and in raw materials that are indispensable for the processing of production.

Q.: Would you please indicate those costs, at least approximately, if possible?

A.: In this report we have an estimated figure of about US$100 million due to damages to capital goods and material damages. Perhaps I can give an example of the impact that this has on our economy. During the four-year period of which I am talking, about 26 boats from our fishing industry have been damaged. Half of them were sunk by mines and the other half were hijacked or destroyed by fire. It might be important to note that at the present moment our total fleet comprises about 50 boats dedicated to fishing activities.

Q.: Is it the case that the economic loss caused includes the loss of development capital?

A.: Production losses, especially those in areas directed towards export, have a negative impact on our capacity to import, which is also more constrained due to the fact that indispensable means of production have been destroyed, so we have to import them. The net result is that we have a lower cash flow in our balance of payments, which also has an impact on our possibilities of servicing our foreign debt.

Q.: Is it true that the economic loss caused includes the loss of foreign trade and adverse effects on the balance of payments?

A.: Yes, the figures estimate the impact on foreign trade and on the balance of payments. For example, damages to production marked for export totalled about US$280 million during this period, which means about 70 per cent of our total earnings from exports during 1984. The war has also affected other types of production for export. Nicaragua has a very fragile economic structure, as I explained before, and we rely on five or six different commodities to obtain our earnings from exports. These commodities are coffee, cotton, meat, sugar, fish and mining products, and since the war has had a great impact on fisheries, mining, coffee production and cattle raising activities, our foreign trade has been affected very seriously. We have estimated that in the absence of war during 1984, our balance of trade would have been improved by at least US$200 million. All these activities have a direct impact on the balance of payments.

Q.: Am I correct in assuming that a significant aspect of the economic damage has consisted of defence costs?

A.: Yes, that is correct.

Q.: Would you please give an indication of those costs?

A.: Our defence budget as part of our total budget was about 12 per cent by 1980, and now during this present year we estimate that the defence budget is going to be between 38 and 40 per cent of our total budget. This means that while the defence budget increases it affects other activities that are also financed through the budget. For example, it affects social programmes, development projects and also the level of consumption of the population, because it has the impact of a big competition in the allocation of resources. Many industrial commodities have to be reallocated from popular consumption to activities directly related to defence.

For example, I remember that during 1983 about 60 per cent of the total production of dry milk was distributed in the Pacific regions of Nicaragua, in which two-thirds of the population live. But, due to the increase in aggression that has had an impact on the production of fresh milk in the war areas, we have had to reduce the quota for the Pacific zones of the country to only 40 per cent. This has had an impact on the consumption level of the population.

Q.: In speaking of defence costs, did your figures include the costs of dealing with the consequences of the hostile activities for the civilian population?

A.: In some of them, yes, but in most of them, no, because it is difficult for us to quantify certain effects of the war on the civilian population. It is difficult for us to quantify, for example, the impact of several thousand people who have been killed, or wounded, and the impact this is going to have on our country, because many of these people were qualified to do civilian jobs. It is also difficult to quantify such things as, for example, that in the regions 1 and 6 — which are located in the northern part of Nicaragua near the border with Honduras — there live about eight hundred thousand persons, of whom about two hundred thousand have been affected in one way or another by the aggression. Many people have been displaced, and due to the difficulties in these areas the control of some epidemic diseases — which had been highly improved in recent years — cannot go on. There are also several thousand students who cannot go to school because of the same reasons. Thus, these are the type of costs that affect the civilian population — such as, for example, the climate of terror that exists in Nicaragua, which keeps the population under stress all the time — this is also very difficult to quantify. I might add to this the necessity of mobilizing several thousand young people who should be — at this moment — at university.

Q.: You have been giving various figures in response to this series of questions. Would you please explain the methodology upon which those figures have been based?

A.: Yes; to establish the economic cost of the aggression, a central register has been established in the presidency. This central register collects the information and provides monthly reports about the impact of the aggression, which also include killings, woundings and kidnappings. The sectoral ministries — especially those that are in charge of overseeing production activities — through their regional delegates estimate the impact on co-operatives, farms and, let us say, in production damage. This provides us with a monthly report in which there is also an effort to estimate the impact that the cumulative cost — to the end of one month, two months, etc. — is going to have during that year. This system, this methodology, has been checked and improved by experts from the Economic Commission for Latin America. The method of doing this is very similar to the one that is used to estimate the impact of natural phenomena, such as floods or earthquakes.

Q.: In your opinion, apart from the economic damage to which you have referred, has the United States caused other types of economic loss to the Republic of Nicaragua?

A.: Yes.

Q.: Can you describe the consequences of the economic pressure applied by the United States that has caused these losses?

A.: I might try to give a perspective of this other type of economic damage. For example, in March 1981 the United States Government decided to suspend the bilateral aid to Nicaragua: even if this was for loans previously contracted. This has had an impact of more than US$36 million. By May 1983 the United States decided to lower our sugar quota by 90 per cent. Since then the annual economic impact has been between 15 and 18 million US dollars due to the preferential system of prices that sugar has in the market of the United States. During that time, also, the United States Government continued to exert pressure on multilateral institutions to impede our access to loans. We have estimated that in the absence of this pressure we might have been able to contract more than 400 million US dollars during these years, of which we estimate that up to now half of it might have been expended.

There is also an economic impact due to the sabotage against our fuel storage tanks in Corinto. The economic impact of destroying twice the oil pipeline — the only oil pipeline that we have in Nicaragua — and of course there is the economic damage due to the mining of our ports, which has had the effect of increasing the freight and the insurance costs. More recently we have to add to this the commercial embargo that was declared against Nicaragua last May.

Q.: To sum up, would you give the Court an estimate of the overall impact on the economic development of Nicaragua of the hostile activities of the United States?

A.: As I previously mentioned, Nicaragua is a developing country with a very fragile infrastructure, and since the aggression has affected everything, the overall impact on the development of my country is really tremendous. There have been examples of the impact on development, for example the one I mentioned earlier, on half of the fleet of vessels dedicated to fishery activities being damaged by the war; in countries like ours, the impact that the blowing up of one bridge has on the economy is big because it means that there is no possibility of going through that road, which is the way of transporting people and commodities. We do not have different systems or alternative systems of roads for reaching different points in Nicaragua. Also the impact on Nicaragua's development has to be seen from the human side: since the beginning of our revolution we have stated as one of our main economic goals to increase the standard of living of our population and another one was to strengthen the economy through investment in the agricultural sector which is the pivotal sector for accumulation in Nicaragua, and since there have been many delays in projects there has been a lot of damage to human life, in medical posts, in schools, etc., and this is going to have a tremendous impact in our country that is going to last several long years after we achieve a solution for the aggression. It is quite difficult to put this into figures because it would require a projection of what would have been without the war; however, I would like to mention that there is a report on Nicaragua made during the year of 1980 and made public during the first quarter of 1981, that is called the Challenge of Reconstruction. This is a report made by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (The World Bank) and I would like to mention it because I think the World Bank is a prestigious economic institution which has the ability of making prognoses and it specializes in matters relating to development. In their projections, the World Bank estimates that between 1980 and 1985 the increase in production in Nicaragua would have been 39 per cent instead of the 9 per cent that is the actual authorized figure. They also said in this report that in the year 1984 our exports would have been US$1.1 billion instead of US$428 million — that is the figure presently authorized. Also, the World Bank estimates in its projections that between 1981 and 1985 our country was supposed to receive a net flow of more than US$400 million coming from multilateral institutions; in reality, the net flow during this period has only been US$100 million. At the end of this document, the final conclusion is that the Nicaraguan economy during this period should have risen at a rate of 6 per cent annually instead of the 1.5 per cent that is the real annual growth of our economy.

Q.: One final question, in its Memorial submitted to the Court, Nicaragua has claimed the sum of a little more than US$370 million, in respect of certain categories of direct damages: in your opinion what proportion does this figure bear to the total economic loss suffered by Nicaragua as a result of the hostile activities of the United States?

A.: I think that that figure of US$370 million is rather a small figure for the overall economic damage to Nicaragua. Several months ago we established an inter-ministerial working group to obtain some preliminary figures about the overall impact on the economy of the aggression, and our preliminary figures are about US$1.3 billion. There is also a recently made document about this same problem by an independent source who specialized in analysing the economic and social situation in countries of Central America and the Caribbean region, which concludes that the total losses due to war are a figure of about three billion dollars.

Mr. ARGÜELLO GÓMEZ: Mr. President, I have finished the questions addressed to Mr. Huper and he remains at the disposal of the Court.

QUESTIONS PUT TO MR. HUPER BY JUDGE SCHWEBEL

Judge SCHWEBEL: Mr. Minister, am I correct in my impression that in the summer of 1979 when the revolutionary government took power, the Nicaraguan economy was in very bad shape, suffering still from an earthquake and, much more than that, suffering from very severe fighting that had taken place in the course of the overthrow of the Somozas?

A.: Quite right, that is correct.

Q.: It is also the fact that immediately on taking power the Sandinista Government began a very large-scale military build-up? I am speaking now of the period of the last half of 1979 and the year 1980, is that the fact or is it not the fact?

A.: Since the Somozas National Guard was properly dismantled and their members had fled to Honduras there was the necessity of building up a new army. So this took place immediately after the beginning of the revolution.

Q.: My understanding is that by the end of 1980, some six months after the assumption of power by the revolutionary government, Nicaragua's armed forces were twice as large as the Somoza National Guard at its height when it was in full bloom and that the Sandinistas Peoples Army doubled in size again by the end of 1982. According to the International Institute of Strategic Studies, Nicaragua's regular armed forces in 1977 under Somoza numbered 7,100 men and 4,000 paramilitary forces. By 1982 the Sandinista armed forces numbered 21,500 and its paramilitary forces 50,000. This is quite a significant build up — would you not agree — to deal with the remnants of the Somoza National Guard?

A.: I think it is a matter related to a different type of activity than the one I am in charge of, and I prefer not to speculate about military facts or this sort of thing.

Q.: I understand that, but I understood you to have cited as an element of the economic trauma or damage which your country had suffered as a result of contra action and United States support of contra action, the large defence forces that Nicaragua consequently has found itself required to maintain and I am inquiring of you how you can make that statement when the record demonstrates that very large forces were built up before contra activity was undertaken and certainly before the United States did anything substantial in respect of the contras, because while you were not in the room, I can inform you that your colleague, Commander Carrión, testified that it was only at the end of 1981 that the contras showed any signs of an infusion of United States assistance. Have you any comments?

A.: Yes, I assume that all countries need, for national defence purposes, to have their own army and so as I mentioned before soon after the beginning of the revolution there was the necessity of building a new army in Nicaragua. I think I mentioned previously the fact that in 1980 the proportion of the defence budget was a total of about 12 per cent of the total Nicaraguan budget and that due to the aggression there was an increase in defence activities which led us to a situation where the defence budget had to be increased. It is important to mention that as far as I know, included in this figure are costs of organizing the population, that is, for defence purposes, for the protection of their own families.

Q.: I have no doubt that Nicaragua's defence forces have been built up very quickly in recent years, since the end of 1981. I was simply pointing out that, by the terms of Nicaragua's own analysis and testimony submitted in this case, the contra action began with United States assistance at the end of 1981 and a very large-scale military build up took place before that time, so presumably it could not have been in response to "aggression" which had not occurred. Indeed, we heard a previous witness testify this morning or yesterday that plans were being discussed for such action in the Fall of 1981, but not that they had been executed before the winter.

Now, let us pass to another item of economic damages that you have mentioned, Mr. Minister. If I understood you correctly, you indicated that you are of the view that an element of damage — I am not sure if this is an element of claims which Nicaragua makes against the United States, you did not make that clear — but at any rate an element of damage sustained, is that the United States cut off aid. That is to say, it had given Nicaragua under the revolutionary government some $118 million in aid. It had repeatedly submitted to the Government of Nicaragua that if it persisted in arming insurgency in El Salvador that aid would stop. In the view of the United States, aid to the insurgency did not stop and the aid was cut off with a certain amount of projected aid not dispersed. Do you maintain that Nicaragua has a claim against the United States for that undelivered aid, that it has some kind of right to that fund?

A.: I think when I mentioned the suspension of bilateral aid from the United States Government it was in the context of some other types of economic aggression costs to Nicaragua.

Secondly, I presume that the decision for the suspension, and the provisional measures that were taken before, are more related to the last month of the electoral campaign in the United States than to the fact of this supposed arms smuggling to El Salvador.

Q.: In that regard I would recall to you that the representations of the United States Government about the shipment of arms to the insurgents began under the Carter Administration, not under the current Administration of the United States. A second item of damage suffered, if I understood you correctly, that you listed, was the lowering of the sugar quota accorded to import of Nicaraguan-produced sugar into the United States — I believe you said by 90 per cent. What is the sugar quota? Can you describe to the Court what this is? It may be that all of us are not familiar with it, as those that live in the western hemisphere may be.

A.: Our sugar quota to the United States used to be about 58,000 short tons and it was lowered to 6,000 short tons. Comparing international prices during 1983 and 1984 and the difference of opportunities between selling sugar in the international market and the preferential prices that are offered in the United States market gives an estimated loss of between US$15 and US$18 million annually.

Q.: And is that an element of the claims of Nicaragua against the United States, that loss as you described it?

A.: I also mention this loss in the context of another type of economic impact due to the aggression against Nicaragua.

Q.: Was there any treaty right of Nicaragua to enjoy a sugar quota, or any other claim as a matter of law to the sugar quota, to your knowledge?

A.: No, I do not know of any.

Q.: Your initial answer is correct. A sugar quota is simply a bonus paid by the United States tax-payer to protect American producers of sugar, but it is not a bonus to which any foreign State is entitled as of right.

Let us now turn to a third item of economic loss, that of loans which Nicaragua anticipated receiving from international institutions but maintains it has not received because of United States opposition to such loans. Viewing this for a moment now, as I will ask you to do, from the perspective of a United States director sitting in an international bank, trying to adjudge whether Nicaragua seemed a good bet for international loans: would you say he might have reason to vote against such loans on the ground that Nicaragua was devoting an enormous proportion of its relatively scarce resources to an unprecedented military build up and was engaged in a course of foreign policy and action which led to the most difficult relations with its immediate neighbours?

A.: More that two years ago officials of the United States Treasury Department made public that the United States was going to oppose any loan that might go to Nicaragua. There is a recent case of a loan requested from the Inter-American Development Bank, which was approved by the technical staff of the Bank before the loan was submitted to the Board of Directors. The Secretary of the Department of State of the United States, Mr. Shultz, sent a letter to Dr. Antonio Ortiz Mena, who is the President of the Inter-American Development Bank, in which he said that the loan should not be given to Nicaragua because, amongst other reasons, this was going to put us in a better economic situation.

Q.: And what were those other reasons that were cited? You said among other reasons, Mr. Minister. Can you recall them?

A.: Yes, I think he mentioned that our internal economic policies were not good, which is something to be said by the technical staff of the Bank, which stated that the loan was technically approved.

Q.: You were not present during the examination of other witnesses. Let me summarize for you some facts that will be pertinent to a question I am about to ask you, which I think can be fairly deduced from the testimony introduced so far.

(a) The Nicaraguan Government has been a source of arms for the insurgency in El Salvador, particularly — possibly exclusively, but certainly particularly — for the big offensive in 1981 of the El Salvadoran insurgents.

(b) The leadership of the El Salvadoran insurgents freely operates out of Managua and elsewhere in Nicaragua.

(c) A radio station of the El Salvadoran insurgents has broadcast from Nicaraguan territory.

(d) The training of El Salvadoran insurgents may well take place in Nicaragua as well as Cuba.

Now, in any event, whatever may finally be established on the extent of the support and the nature of the support by the Government of Nicaragua for insurgency in El Salvador, let us assume for the purposes of this question that the Nicaraguan Government is or has been significantly involved in support of the insurgency in El Salvador since the Sandinistas came to power. Now you, Sir, have testified that Nicaragua has suffered some US$370 million in, I believe, direct damages from the degradations of the contras and related actions and you have spoken of other economic damage suffered. If I understand the purport of your testimony and your Government's Memorial correctly, your Government means to claim reparation from the United States for at least the former category of damages, should it be established by the Court that the United States is responsible under international law. Now, permit me to note that the Government of El Salvador filed a Declaration of Intervention in this case in which it claims to have suffered about $1 billion in damages — $800 million as at the end of 1983 — from the activities of the insurgents, which El Salvador claims are critically and vitally supported by the Government of Nicaragua. Permit me to read a few sentences from its Declaration (I, p. 455):

> "The damage caused to the economy, to our infrastructure and to the people of our country is immense and very difficult to calculate. The cost in human lives is alarming. As a result of the insurgency, supported by the Sandinistas, we have approximately half a million persons internally displaced in our country and over 30,000 persons have been killed in the conflict since it was unleashed in 1979. The subversives, aided and abetted by their allies in Nicaragua, have destroyed farms, businesses, bridges, roads, dams, power sources, trains and buses. They have mined our roads in an attempt to disrupt our economy and with the purpose of preventing our citizens from participating effectively in the national elections. The total of damages produced by this subversion to the Salvadoran economy since 1979 to the end of 1983 has been conservatively estimated to amount to approximately $800 million."

I apologize for that long introduction, Mr. Minister, but my questions are these: does it follow from the principles of State responsibility and imputability that if the United States is financially liable to Nicaragua for the damage inflicted by the contras, Nicaragua is financially liable to El Salvador for the damage inflicted by the Salvadoran insurgents? That is to say, I am now asking you, Sir, whether the very theory of damages advanced by your Government does not equally apply against your Government and in behalf of El Salvador?

A.: We have always stated that the Nicaraguan Government has never been engaged in arms smuggling in Central America and secondly, I think that it is commonly known that the United States Government not only finances but also directs and controls the contras' activities in Nicaragua, thus the United States Government is responsible for the economic damage that has been caused during these activities.

Q.: I might point out that the record as it has been put before the Court the last few days does not seem to fully sustain the denial you have just made of the involvement of your Government in support of the insurgents in El Salvador by the shipment of arms. But, quite apart from that, I would be interested in knowing whether it is your impression as a senior official of the Government of Nicaragua resident in Managua whether leadership of the El Salvador insurgents is or is not frequently present and operating on Nicaraguan soil. Do you have any impression as to that?

A.: As far as it is related to myself, I have never had a meeting with them and I have never seen one of them in Nicaragua.

Judge SCHWEBEL: I have no further questions.

The meeting rose at 4.40 p.m.

Mr. ARGÜELLO GÓMEZ: Mr. President, Members of the Court, at this point I will limit myself to indicating the way in which the pleadings will proceed. We have divided our pleadings into the following general categories. First, the issues of fact which will be examined today by Professor Chayes and Mr. Reichler. The point and the nature of the evidence will be examined tomorrow by Professor Brownlie and, in the following session, the breaches of relevant multilateral treaties will be examined by Professor Chayes. The bilateral Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation will be examined by Professor Pellet, and a further point, which is the role of customary law, will be examined by Professor Brownlie. I will, at the end, as Agent address certain relevant questions that have arisen in the course of these hearings.

Now, Mr. President, if it pleases the Court, I would ask you give the podium to Professor Chayes to start the pleadings.

COUNSEL FOR THE GOVERNMENT OF NICARAGUA

Professor CHAYES: Mr. President, Members of the Court. May it please the Court.

Nicaragua has now completed the presentation of its proof in this case. The material in evidence is lengthy and complex. It consists of almost 400 affidavits, official statements and other documents in the Annexes to the written pleadings in the Merits phase alone, and more than 12 hours of testimony by the witnesses you have heard in the last few days.

As is quite obvious in this courtroom, the Respondent in this case, the United States of America has declined to participate in this phase of the proceedings. In such circumstances, under Article 53 of the Statute, the Court must satisfy itself not only that it has jurisdiction of the case, but "that the claim is well founded in fact and law". The Court has already decided, on the basis of written and oral pleadings in which the United States participated fully, that it has jurisdiction and that the case is admissible. Nicaragua believes that the evidence presented proves beyond any shadow of doubt that Nicaragua's claims are well founded in fact, and that the United States is in violation of its most fundamental international obligations under the Charter of the United Nations and the Organization of American States, under the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation between Nicaragua and the United States, and under general international law.

The Court itself has recognized that in cases of this sort, and in the absence of the Respondent, the evidence will necessarily come from a variety of sources — some of them less formal than is usual in international adjudication (Corfu Channel, I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 4, at 248; United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran, I.C.J. Reports 1980, p. 3, at 9-10). In this case, the documentary evidence before you consists in large part of statements of the President of the United States, high officials of his Administration, and members of Congress.

For almost all of the statements of the President and congressmen, as well as for many others, we have been able to provide the Court with official texts. In some cases, however, we rely on press reports of the statements of officials and public events. We have not cited these reports for the opinions or characterizations of the journalists who wrote them. Professor Brownlie will discuss the legal significance of these various categories of evidence in detail tomorrow.

In the present phase, Nicaragua has presented the testimony of six witnesses. Mr. Chamorro's evidence was in the form of an affidavit, because his attorneys advised him that leaving the United States to appear here in person could prejudice his application for permanent resident status.

The testimony of these witnesses is offered to fill in some of the contours of the documentary case with the immediacy that can only come from direct participation in events. Nicaragua accords this evidence the highest significance. The Court has seen the witnesses first hand and had the opportunity to question them and test their credibility. In this present review of the evidence we propose to emphasize the bearing of this testimony, since the documentary evidence has been analysed at length in the written pleadings.

My colleagues and I have considered how we can best assist the Court at this stage in approaching the great mass of evidence and documentation before it. Nicaragua has already summarized the evidence in chronological form at several stages of the case. Attached to the Application was a Chronological Appendix recounting the facts on which the Nicaraguan claims are based from February 1981 to 9 April 1984, the date of the filing of the Application. This chronology was amplified and brought up to date in the Memorial of Nicaragua on the Merits, filed on 30 April 1985 (paras. 26-150). A further chronological supplement, incorporating new evidence that has come to light since 30 April was submitted to the Court in advance of these oral proceedings (see Supp., Ann. A). In each case, the chronology is supported at every point by detailed references to the documentary evidence before the Court.

In these circumstances, Mr. President, there seems little reason to begin the oral pleadings with yet another chronological narrative of the events in issue. Instead, Nicaragua has tried to identify a few overarching propositions that we believe represent the central factual elements of the case. Our purpose today is to summarize and marshal the evidence in the record in support of each of these propositions, so that the Court can "satisfy itself" in the language of Article 53 of their soundness.

With the Court's permission, I will first set out these central propositions:

1. The United States conceived, created and organized a mercenary army, the contra force. It recruited the troops, organized them in operational divisions, established a unified military command, and controlled the growth of the force.

2. The Government of the United States has armed, equipped and trained the contra force. It has provided substantially all of the weapons, equipment, supply, training and funding for this force, and has determined both the kinds and amount of military material needed to send the contras into the field.

3. The Government of the United States has devised the strategy and directed the tactics of the contra force.

4. The Government of the United States provides direct combat support for the military operations of the contra force.

5. The political leadership of the contras was hand-picked, installed and paid by the United States, both to ensure United States control and to generate congressional and public support for the administration's policies.

6. United States military and intelligence personnel conducted direct attacks against Nicaragua including destruction of its oil supply system and the mining of its harbours.

7. The actions of the United States reflects policy decisions and priorities established at the highest levels of the current United States administration and executed under its supervision. In no sense can they be regarded as an aberration or the unauthorized activities of subordinates.

8. The purpose of the policy and the actions against Nicaragua in pursuance of this policy was, from the beginning, to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua.

Mr. Reichler will deal with the first four of these factual propositions; I will cover the last four.

Before turning the podium over to Mr. Reichler, however, I would like to say a preliminary word about the last of these propositions — the purpose of the United States Government in undertaking, at the initiative of its highest officials and with their full knowledge and approval, a co-ordinated campaign of force against a small country, extending over four years, and including the widespread use of terror, sabotage and atrocity as deliberate tactics. The evidence shows that the animating purpose of all these actions was to destabilize the present Government of Nicaragua, and to replace it with a régime that was acceptable to the present Administration in the United States. From the beginning, it was the form and character of the duly constituted Government of Nicaragua that offended the United States Administration and was unacceptable to it. The policies and actions shown in this record cannot be characterized as self-defence in response to an "armed attack" on the United States or any other State. Nor were they designed to interdict a supposed flow of arms from Nicaragua to insurgents in El Salvador. The myth of "arms flow" and "arms interdiction", as the evidence shows, was invented at the very outset of the programme as a cover story to mask the real purpose which would have been unacceptable to the Congress and people of the United States along with the rest of the world.

I said a moment ago that the record before you contains a mass of complex material. But all of it falls into place once we understand this dominant purpose which runs like a leitmotif through all of the concrete policies and activities in the case. The entire body of the evidence is instinct with this purpose and, in the end, it is this purpose which must condemn the United States at the bar of this Court.

I now ask the President to call on Mr. Reichler.

COUNSEL FOR THE GOVERNMENT OF NICARAGUA

Mr. REICHLER: Mr. President, Members of the Court, may it please the Court. As Professor Chayes has stated, my task is to summarize the evidence presented to the Court with respect to the first four factual propositions identified by Professor Chayes. Because of the large volume of evidence in this case, time and consideration for the Court's patience require me to bring to the Court's attention today only a small part of this evidence. In an effort to be of maximum assistance to the Court I have chosen to emphasize the evidence that has been submitted most recently, specifically the testimony of the witnesses and the supplemental annexes presented to the Court on 10 September which, of course, were not discussed or analysed in Nicaragua's Memorial of 30 April.

In the course of my remarks I will make specific reference to some of the more significant documentary exhibits that Nicaragua has submitted. But I will spare the Court the burden of listening to the precise record citations for all of the evidence that I will discuss. These citations, I trust, will be included in the written record of my remarks. With the Court's permission, I will now proceed to the first factual proposition.

I. The Government of the United States Conceived and Created the Contra Force

The evidence before the Court proves that the contras owe their very existence, as a military force, to the United States. This is openly acknowledged by senior officials of the United States Government and by members of the United States Congress with access to all relevant information. As expressed by representative Wyche Fowler, a member of the Intelligence Committee of the House of Representatives which is responsible for oversight of all military and paramilitary activities against Nicaragua, "There was no indigenous uprising of Nicaraguans against the Sandinista Government before the United States decided to finance such an uprising" (that is in Ann. E, Attachment 3, 129 Cong. Rec. H5752 (27 July 1983)).

The evidence shows that the United States made its decision to finance an uprising against the Nicaraguan Government in the Fall of 1981. A plan for military and paramilitary activities against Nicaragua was prepared by the Latin American Affairs Division of the CIA. David MacMichael, a CIA intelligence analyst who was advised of the plan at that time, has testified that the plan called for the CIA to create a paramilitary force, consisting initially of 1,500 men, to carry out armed attacks and sabotage in and against Nicaragua (pp. 43-44; pp. 49-51, supra). Mr. MacMichael has confirmed the accuracy of certain excerpts from the plan itself and its accompanying classified memoranda, which were published in the newspapers in the United States (p. 49, supra; Ann. F, Nos. 4, 23, 36, 187, at pp. 6-7, 47-49, 67-71, 281-83). These documents proposed an initial allocation to the CIA of 19,950,000 dollars for the creation of a 1,500-man force, but carefully advised "more money and more manpower will be needed". From the very beginning, the record shows, the CIA treated the relationship between more money and more manpower as one of cause and effect. The official documents describing the CIA plan further stated that the CIA would "build popular support in Central America and Nicaragua for an opposition front that would be nationalistic, anti-Cuban and anti-Somoza; support the opposition front through formation and training of action teams to collect intelligence and engage in paramilitary and political operations in Nicaragua and elsewhere; work primarily through non-Americans to achieve the foregoing, but in some circumstances the CIA might take unilateral paramilitary action — possibly using United States personnel — against special Cuban targets" (Ann. F, Nos. 23, 36, at pp. 47-49, 67-71; see also p. 49, supra).

It is now a matter of public record in the United States that President Reagan approved the CIA's plan at a meeting of the National Security Council on 16 November 1981. On 23 November, one week later, the President signed National Security Decision Directive 17, which put the plan into immediate effect. As required by domestic United States law, a Presidential finding was sent to the Intelligence Committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives, and the members of the Committees were orally briefed by CIA officials. The Intelligence Committee of the House of Representatives later published a report describing the implementation of the plan in the following way: "encouragement and support has been provided to foster insurgency within Nicaragua" (Ann. E, Attachment 1, House Intelligence Committee Report, IV, p. 244, 13 May 1983). The existence of this plan, its essential nature and purpose, its approval by the President and the fact of its implementation have all been confirmed for the Court by Mr. MacMichael (pp. 43-44; 49, supra).

The evidence demonstrates that, pursuant to the plan, the CIA recruited and organized a paramilitary force consisting initially of Nicaraguans who had belonged to the National Guard, the armed forces under the Somoza Government (pp. 14; 49, 59-60, supra; Ann. F, No. 4, pp. 6-7). Many were living in exile in the United States and various Central American countries. Some of them existed as armed bands along the Nicaragua-Honduras border (ibid.).

The evidence firmly establishes, as representative Fowler reported, that these scattered bands of ex-National Guardsmen did not themselves constitute an insurgency against the Nicaraguan Government prior to the CIA's involvement with them. They were militarily and politically insignificant. Commander Carrión testified that, until December 1981:

> "they were just a few small bands very poorly armed, scattered along the northern border of Nicaragua and they were composed mainly of ex-members of the Somoza's National Guard. They did not have any military effectiveness and what they mainly did was rustling cattle and killing some civilians near the border lines" (p. 13, supra).

This is confirmed by the contemporaneous public statements of United States Government officials, who were describing the ex-Guardsmen at that time, to take one example, as "insects buzzing around the Sandinistas' ankles" (Ann. F, No. 188). A similar description was given by the former contra leader Edgar Chamorro, who had first-hand knowledge of the status of these groups. Mr. Chamorro, the Court will recall from his affidavit, was appointed by the CIA to a leadership position in the contra organization:

> "At the time, the ex-National Guardsmen were divided into several small bands operating along the Nicaragua-Honduras border . . . the bands were poorly armed and equipped, and thoroughly disorganized. They were not an effective military force and represented no more than a minor irritant to the Nicaraguan Government." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 7.)

Mr. Chamorro's affidavit states that the CIA began its efforts to join these bands into an effective military force several months before its formal plan for covert military and paramilitary actions against Nicaragua was submitted to President Reagan. Mr. Chamorro has further testified that a senior United States Government official, General Vernon Walters, personally met with the leaders of these bands and promised that they would receive United States assistance and support if they joined together in a single organization (Supp. Ann. G, para. 6). General Walters is currently the United States Ambassador to the United Nations. At that time, he was a special assistant to the Secretary of State with ambassadorial rank. He had previously been Deputy Director of the CIA.

General Walters and CIA officials also sought to merge the Union Democratica Nicaraguense, or "Nicaraguan Democratic Union", a political organization of anti-Sandinista Nicaraguan exiles living in Miami, Florida, with the ex-National Guardsmen who had already been brought together by General Walters. According to Mr. Chamorro, then a leader of the UDN, General Walters told his group:

> "that the United States Government was prepared to help us remove the FSLN from power in Nicaragua, but that, as a condition for receiving this help, we had to join forces with the ex-National Guardsmen . . . We were well aware of the crimes the Guardsmen had committed against the Nicaraguan people while in the service of President Somoza, and we wanted nothing to do with them. However, we recognized that without help from the United States Government we had no chance of removing the Sandinistas from power, so we eventually acceded to the CIA's, and General Walters', insistence that we join forces with the Guardsmen." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 6.)

Mr. Chamorro goes on:

> "The merger . . . was accomplished in August 1981 at a meeting in Guatemala City, Guatemala, where formal documents were signed. The meeting was arranged and the documents were prepared by the CIA. The new organization was called the Fuerza Democratica Nicaraguense ('Nicaraguan Democratic Force') or by its Spanish acronym, FDN. It was to be headed by a political junta . . . The name of the organization, the members of the political junta, and the members of the general staff were all chosen or approved by the CIA." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 7.)

The CIA was thus mother, father and midwife to the FDN. Once the CIA's plan was approved by President Reagan, the United States Government provided the newly created FDN with the assistance and support that had been promised by General Walters and others. Mr. Chamorro testified:

> "Soon after the merger, the FDN began to receive a substantial and steady flow of financial, military and other assistance from the CIA. Former National Guardsmen who had sought exile in El Salvador, Guatemala and the United States after the fall of the Somoza Government were recruited to enlarge the military component of the organization. They were offered regular salaries, the funds for which were supplied by the CIA." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 8.)

Commander Carrión informed the Court of the amounts of these salaries; they:

> "ranged from 300 dollars a month for the common soldier . . . up to 1,500 dollars a month for the higher officers. These officers were also put as leaders and commanders of the commanding structure and the operational military units." (P. 15, supra.)

By the end of 1981, the CIA's dominant role in creating, organizing and recruiting the contra military force was evident. Commander Carrión testified that:

> "After December 1981 we began to observe that [the] contras started to act on the basis of their centralized plans, military training camps were set up in Honduras and in the United States for training the contras, new weapons were delivered to the contra forces and the centralized command was set up." (P. 13, supra.)

In December 1981, the FDN launched its first organized attack against Nicaragua. Code named "Red Christmas", it was the first time the contras operated pursuant to any kind of military plan, let alone one with a name (p. 14).

The evidence shows that at the time of the Red Christmas attack, the contras had approximately 1,000 to 1,200 men (p. 29, supra). More money and more men were to follow, and the two were closely linked. The record establishes that in 1982 the United States Government provided another 30 milllion dollars for covert military and paramilitary activities against Nicaragua; the May 1983 Report of the House of Representatives Intelligence Committee (Ann. E, Attachment 1, IV, p. 249) states that the funding was secretly approved by Congress in August 1982. As a consequence, by the end of the year — 1982 — the contra force grew to approximately 3,500 to 4,000 men (Carrión testimony, p. 14, supra; see also Ann. F, No. 36, p. 70). In 1983, the United States provided another 24 million dollars, expressly for military and paramilitary activities in Nicaragua, and the contra force grew correspondingly to more than 7,000 men. The 24-million dollar appropriation was done openly, by direct Congressional action, and became part of domestic United States law. Since United States support for the contras was no longer covert — all of its essential features had been revealed in the United States press and acknowledged by United States officials — there was no longer any reason for the Congress to keep it hidden. Section 108 of the Intelligence Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1984, enacted into law on 9 December 1983, therefore expressly provided:

> "During fiscal year 1984, not more than $24,000,000 of the funds available to the Central Intelligence Agency, the Department of Defense, or any other agency or entity of the United States involved in intelligence activities may be obligated or expended for the purpose or which would have the effect of supporting, directly or indirectly, military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua by any nation, group, organization, movement, or individual." (Ann. D, Attachment 4.)

That is a statute of the United States.

In addition to the funds provided by the United States, which totalled more than 70 million dollars from the approval of the CIA's plan in the Fall of 1981 until the end of 1983, a principal reason for the rapid growth in the contra force was the method of recruitment used. Many of the contra fighters were recruited by force. Commander Carrión gave vivid testimony regarding these recruitment practices. Here is the testimony of Mr. Chamorro:

> "FDN units would arrive at an undefended village, assemble all the residents in the town square and then proceed to kill — in full view of the others — all persons suspected of working for the Nicaraguan Government or the FSLN, including police, local militia members, party members, health workers, teachers, and farmers from government sponsored co-operatives.

In this atmosphere, it was not difficult to persuade those able-bodied men left alive to return with the FDN units to their base camps in Honduras and enlist in the force. This was, unfortunately, a widespread practice that accounted for many recruits." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 9.)

These recruits provided the foot-soldiers for what had become, by virtue of the CIA's efforts and resources, a thoroughly integrated, well-organized and well-equipped army. The contrast with the scattered, disorganized and poorly-armed bands of ex-Guardsmen that the CIA started with was dramatic. In place of a few rag-tag groups of armed bandits roaming the remote countryside and thieving cattle, there was now a fully fledged army functioning under a single and unified command. The structure of this army was described by Commander Carrión:

"The head of this command was something called a joint staff major; this joint staff major was conformed by a CIA officer known as Colonel Raymond and by Enrique Bermudez who is in charge of the military operations on the part of the contras. Under this joint command, there is a complex system of different services for the military combat units. They have a medical service, a public communications service; they have what they call civilian services, a supply centre and what they call the strategic command which is the operational head structure. Under the strategic command there is a logistic section, a school section, that is a training section, a special forces section — what they call internal forces, air force section, and what is known as the tactical operations command. Under this tactical operations command are the operational military units which are called regional commands. The regional commands have perfectly well-defined operational areas where they normally act and they are the superior structure under which are the so-called task forces. Each regional command has under its command three or four task forces which are then subdivided into smaller units. This is then the structure corresponding to a fairly well-developed army and up to this point, that is what the contra is, a very well-equipped and organized army." (P. 19, supra.)

This well-developed army — which, as Commander Carrión testified, was organized along the lines of North American, not Latin American militaries — did not evolve independently. As I have discussed, the evidence establishes that the contra army was the conception and creation of the United States Government. This is confirmed by, among others, Mr. Chamorro, who was eye-witness to the growth and development of the contra forces and the influence of the United States:

"1982 was a year of transition for the FDN. From a collection of small disorganized and ineffectual bands of ex-National Guardsmen, the FDN grew into a well-organized, well-armed, well-equipped and well-trained fighting force of approximately 4,000 men capable of inflicting great harm on Nicaragua. This was due entirely to the CIA, which organized, equipped, trained and supplied us." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 9.)

In sum, the evidence conclusively establishes the validity of the first proposition: that the contra military force was conceived and created by the United States Government. It was, to put it simply — but accurately — made in the USA.

II. The Government of the United States Has Armed, Equipped and Trained the Contra Force

The evidence establishes the complete dependence of the contra force on the United States for its arms, equipment and training, three critical elements of its military capacity. Mr. Chamorro's testimony directly addresses this point:

> "The FDN never received money to purchase arms, ammunition or military equipment. These were acquired for us and delivered directly to us by the CIA. One of the senior agents at the CIA's Tegucigalpa [that's the capital of Honduras] station, known to us as 'the Colonel', was an expert in these matters, and he, together with his assistants, determined what we needed and obtained it for us, including: arms, ammunition, uniforms, boots, radio equipment, etc. As long as I was in Honduras (until June 1984), the FDN never acquired its own arms, ammunition or military equipment. We were just the end receivers." (Ibid., para. 17.)

Mr. Chamorro's testimony is corroborated by the declaration, to the New York Times, of a United States Government official described as "closely linked to the rebels". This official, subsequently identified as Lieutenant Colonel Oliver North of the National Security Council, described the impact on the contras of legislation in October 1984, legislation that resulted in direct operational control of the contras passing from the CIA to the National Security Council:

> "When the agency pulled out of this programme, these guys didn't know how to buy a Band-Aid. They knew nothing of logistics, the CIA had been doing all of that." (Supp. Ann. D, No. 54, p. 64.)

The evidence shows that the contras received far more than Band-Aids from the CIA. Commander Carrión described the impressive arsenal of weapons the CIA delivered to the contras:

> "Prior to the end of 1981 the contras had the weapons they had taken from Nicaragua when the National Guards abandoned and fled to other Central American countries. But when the CIA needed new weapons for the increasing contra force, the CIA just got the weapons, FAL rifles, as I said before, and delivered these weapons to them. That was in the beginning."

One of the contras' own supply officers, Captain Armando Lopez, described the CIA's first delivery of 92 FAL rifles, four machine guns and two mortars to the contras in the following manner: "We were all hugging, we forgot about rank. We kissed our weapons. It seemed like a dream." (Ann. F, No. 196, p. 299.)

> "Afterwards CIA AK 47 rifles — which are also very modern assault rifles — were given to the contras. The contras never had to buy weapons in the market. The CIA has always supplied them. And recently the CIA is supplyng the contras with a G 3 rifle, which is the German equivalent to the FAL rifle, and it is the one that they are supplying right now. They supply not only rifles, but other types of weapons too. They supply them with a disposable rocket launcher called a light offensive weapon or LOW, with a grenade launcher called M 79 grenade launcher, they supply them with mortars of 60 millimetres and 81 millimetres — the last one is considered as medium range, in the practical sense, an artillery weapon. They also supply them with heavy machine guns, mostly M 60. All of these are made in the United States and came directly from the United States to the contras in Honduras. They also supplied the contras with all sorts of high-powered explosives, mainly the plastic explosive known as C 4 and mines of all sorts, anti-personnel mines, anti-carrier mines, of different sizes and types and TNT and other explosive devices for sabotage." (Pp. 19-20, supra.)

Captain Lopez of the contras described their reaction to these CIA weapons deliveries: "In 1983 we felt like one who had won the lottery. We lacked shoulders to carry all the weapons we got." (Ann. F, No. 1986, p. 299.)

The CIA not only supplied weapons to the contras, it trained them in how to use the weapons, and it provided them with a full range of military training. The Report of the House of Representatives Intelligence Committee of May 1983 acknowledged the CIA's training function:

> "There has been a hidden program of the Central American policy, however, which has had important consequences for the viability of the public policy. This hidden program is the nominally covert provision of US support and training to anti-Sandinista insurgents." (Ann. E, Attachment 1, Report of the House Committee on Intelligence, 13 May 1983.)

Mr. Chamorro described some of this training in his Affidavit:

> "Most of the C.I.A. operatives who worked with us in Honduras were Military trainers and advisers. Our troops were trained in guerrilla warfare, sabotage, demolitions, and in the use of a variety of weapons, including assault rifles, machine guns, mortars, grenade launchers and explosives, such as Claymore mines." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 18.)

Mr. Chamorro added that: "A special unit was created for sabotage, especially demolitions; it was trained directly by CIA personnel at Lepaterique, near Tegucigalpa." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 8.) Commander Carrión testified that the Nicaraguan Government has been able to identify "at least" 11 United States citizens — CIA agents — working with the contras in Honduras (p. 28, supra). Mr. Chamorro testified that there were "about 20" CIA Agents working directly with the contras (Supp. Ann. G, para. 16.)

The evidence establishes that the contras received no military training before the CIA entered the picture. From early 1982 until the beginning of 1984, the CIA paid at least 10 Argentinians — ex-members of the armed forces of that country — to help train the contras. Two of these Argentinians were former colonels — Santiago Villejas and Oswaldo Rivero, also known as Ballita. (Carrión testimony, p. 27, supra; Suppl. Ann. G, para. 8). The evidence shows that the Argentinians were recruited to serve as a cover for United States Government involvement with the contras. When the CIA plan was still under discussion, the United States Secretary of State Alexander Haig expressed the concern that the programme was "too large to hide" and he insisted that a third party be found to manage it so that the United States could plausibly deny its responsibility (Ann. F, No. 197, pp. 281-283). It was at that time, and for that reason, that the Argentinians were recruited. By the middle of 1983, however, as I indicated previously, the CIA's role with the contras was public knowledge in the United States. In the words of the Minority Leader of the House of Representatives, it was "about as covert as an elephant standing on a football field" (Ann. E, Attachment 3, 129 Cong. Rec. H5738, 27 July 1983 (remarks of Rep. Robert Michel)). Accordingly, by 1984 the Argentinians were no longer needed and the CIA was itself exercising full responsibility for all military and paramilitary training of the contra forces.

In sum, the evidence before the Court fully demonstrates the validity of what Representative James Wright, Majority Leader of the United States House of Representatives and a member of the Intelligence Committee, reported to his fellow legislators: the contras were "recruited, trained, financed, equipped, and sent into" Nicaragua by the United States Government (Ann. E, Attachment 4, 129 Cong. Rec. H5837, 28 July 1983). This is not simply a case of the contras receiving some arms, some ammunition, some supplies or some training from the United States. This is a case, fully supported by the evidence, where the United States provided all of the arms, all of the ammunition, all of the supplies and all of the training — and as I shall now proceed to show, much more as well.

III. The Government of the United States Has Devised and Directed the Military Strategies and Tactics of the Contra Force

The evidence presented to the Court establishes, beyond question, that the United States has made all of the critical decisions concerning the strategic objectives and military tactics employed by the contras.

A review of the various contra offensives makes this obvious. In the first place, the timing of each of these offensives was determined by the United States. Every contra offensive was preceded by a new infusion of funds from the United States, starting with the first one in December 1981, which came about shortly after President Reagan authorized 19,950,000 dollars for these activities. The December 1982 offensive was preceded by an appropriation of 30 million dollars. The December 1983 offensive was preceded by the provision of 24 million dollars. There were no funds provided at the end of 1984; consequently there was no offensive. An additional 27 million dollars was approved at the beginning of June 1985; the contras launched an offensive two weeks later.

The specific strategic objectives and the tactics employed in these offensives were also dictated by the United States. As I have already discussed, in late 1981 the CIA forged a single military organization out of scattered, diverse armed groups and created a unified command structure. That enabled the contras, for the first time, to operate under an orchestrated military plan, which the CIA code named "Red Christmas". This first attempt to take and hold Nicaraguan territory failed.

The CIA's strategy during the first half of 1982 emphasized the use of hit-and-run raids and sabotage. Commander Carrión has described the demolition of two key bridges on 14 March 1982, over the Rio Negro in Chinandega province and the Rio Coco in Nueva Segovia, near the Pan American Highway (p. 14, supra). CIA officials expressly acknowledged the Agency's responsibility for the destruction of these two bridges in briefings given to the Intelligence Committee of the House of Representatives in May 1982 (Ann. F, No. 36, pp. 67-71; No. 188, pp. 284-287). These attacks, along with similar sabotage raids on other bridges, fuel tanks, a customs warehouse, government buildings and other targets, are also described in a classified Weekly Intelligence Summary of the United States Defense Intelligence Agency, which was later published in the newspapers in the United States (Ann. C, Attachment III-2).

After these successful sabotage raids in early 1982, a National Security Council Summary Paper prepared in April 1982 reported that: "In Nicaragua, the Sandinistas are under increased pressure as a result of our covert efforts." (Ann. C, Attachment III-1.) That document, as well, was later published in the newspapers in the United States.

At the end of 1982, the CIA determined that the contra forces were sufficiently organized, trained and equipped to implement a new strategic objective. The new plan, called "C plan" or "Strategy of Terror", was an offensive designed to take over the town of Jalapa in the far north of Nicaragua, install a "provisional government" there, and call for international recognition. Commander Carrión testified that to carry out this plan,

> "they concentrated the troops around Jalapa right on the border line and from there they did many attacks with artillery support . . . they were not able to take over Jalapa, but as a result of this offensive many towns were put under artillery fire and there were many civilian casualties as well as military casualties." (P. 16, supra.)

Mr. Chamorro confirmed that the CIA was behind the strategy:

> "By the end of 1982, we were ready to launch our first major military offensive designed to take and hold Nicaraguan territory, which the CIA was urging us to do. Our principal objective was the town of Jalapa." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 9.)

After the failure of the 1982 offensive, the CIA changed its strategy. The new strategy was to penetrate contra forces deeper into the interior of Nicaragua, disrupt life within the country as much as possible, and thus foster political destabilization. During 1983, CIA officials, including the Director of Central Intelligence, William Casey, travelled to Honduras and instructed the contras that they must begin to conduct a "classic guerrilla war" (Ann. F, No. 157, p. 247; No. 48, pp. 89-90). Afterwards, Commander Carrión testified, the contras

> "started to infiltrate groups, small groups at first, deeper into Nicaraguan territory where they would have more objectives within reach let's say — state farms, co-operatives, grain stores, health centres and so on — and it is during this period . . . that ambushes occurred on the road against any vehicle, civilian or military." (P. 16, supra.)

United States authorship of this strategy is evident from the fact, corroborated by various sources, that the CIA, for the first time, furnished the contras with aeroplanes without which the contra units could not have been resupplied and therefore maintained inside Nicaragua for the extended periods of time necessary to carry out the plan (ibid.). United States direction of strategy and tactics is further confirmed by the fact that the contras themselves opposed this strategy but were compelled to accept it.

Mr. Chamorro testified that after the failure of the 1982 offensive, the FDN's officers wanted more time to regroup and prepare themselves at their base camps in Honduras before returning to Nicaragua: "The FDN officers were overruled by the CIA, however. The agency told us that we had to move our men back into Nicaragua and keep fighting. We had no choice but to obey." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 19.)

In September 1983, President Reagan sent a new finding to the Congressional Intelligence Committees to support his request for more funds to finance the contras' activities, a request that the Congress ultimately approved (Ann. D, Attachments 3 and 4 (Department of Defense Appropriations Act for FY 1984, Sec. 775, Intelligence Authorization Act for FY 1984, Sec. 108)). His finding set forth a new strategy: the destruction of vital economic installations and the infliction of maximum harm on the Nicaraguan economy (Ann. F, No. 47, p. 88). This strategy was publicly disclosed the following month by Representative Lee Hamilton of the Intelligence Committee of the House of Representatives: "We now see a new strategy. That strategy is to target economic targets like electrical plants and storage facilities." (Ann. C, Attachment 5, 130 Cong. Rec. H8416, 20 Oct., 1983.) Previously, Mr. Chamorro testified, the contras were instructed by the CIA to avoid such targets because attacking them might be politically counter-productive (Supp. Ann. G, para. 19). Now, however, the CIA instructed the contras to attack coffee plantations and coffee pickers, in order to interfere with the cultivation and harvesting of Nicaragua's lifeblood export crop. Mr. Chamorro testified that the contras followed this instruction (Supp. Ann. G, para. 19), and Commander Carrión confirmed that the coffee crop in fact suffered significantly from such attacks, especially in the first half of 1984 (p. 18, supra).

The CIA also decided at this time to target Nicaragua's supply of oil, as a key element of its new emphasis on economic targets. Mr. Chamorro testified that the CIA official in overall charge of the contra operation, Duane Clarridge, told the contra leadership that,

> "something must be done to cut off Nicaragua's oil supplies, because without oil the Nicaraguan military would be immobilized and its capacity to resist our forces would be drastically reduced" (Supp. Ann. G, para. 20).

This plan, which ultimately included assaults on oil pipelines and storage tanks, and the mining of Nicaragua's ports, was undertaken directly by United States military and intelligence personnel, rather than the contras, and will be discussed by Professor Chayes later. I mention it here as a further illustration of the United States direction of the strategy and tactics of the military activities against Nicaragua.

Still more proof of this lies in the fact that the contra offensive launched at the end of 1983 was preceded by direct instructions from Duane Clarridge to stage a major attack on Nicaragua, seize some territory, however small, and declare a provisional government that would then be recognized by the United States (Supp. Ann. G, para. 22). The plan was called "Plan Sierra" and was aimed — as in 1982 — at taking Jalapa. Commander Carrión described this offensive to the Court in some detail (pp. 18-19, supra). Like the earlier effort to take Jalapa, it failed, although numerous casualities were inflicted on both civilian and military objectives (ibid.).

The most recent contra offensive, launched in June of this year, was called "Plan Repunte" or "Come Back Plan". It, too, reflects United States control over the contras' strategy and tactics. As described by Commander Carrión, the plan called for the contras to penetrate deeper into Nicaragua than they ever before attempted, and attack important economic targets and populated areas in order "to create an impression of political crisis and to portray the Government as incapapable of holding control of the situation" (p. 23, supra). Here again, the dependence of the plan on frequent and abundant resupply of contra units by air deep inside Nicaragua, and on precise intelligence pinpointing the location of Nicaraguan Government troops — all of which could only be provided by the United States — demonstrates that it was a strategy necessarily designed by the United States.

In addition to dictating the general and specific strategic objectives of the contras, the United States also instructed the contras on the field tactics to be employed by their forces. In the military sense, these tactics were determined by the amount and type of weapons the contras received, all of which came from the United States. But the United States directly influenced the tactics of the contras on the ground in other ways as well.

The widespread use of terror tactics by the contras is not open to dispute. These tactics are thoroughly documented in the reports of several independent human rights organizations and fact-finding missions, which are included in Annex I. Professor Glennon has testified about the findings of his in loco investigation. The Court has heard Father Loison's account of contra terror he encountered while living and working in La Trinidad. Even CIA officials have acknowledged, in testimony before Congressional committees, that the contras have committed these abuses including rapes, torture and murder of unarmed civilians, including children (Ann. F, No. 165, p. 257). Mr. Chamorro has admitted that it was standard contra practice to kill prisoners and suspected Sandinista collaborators (Supp. Ann. G, para. 27).

The record demonstrates with equal force that the contras adopted these tactics with the advice, encouragement and approval of the United States. Mr. Chamorro has testified:

> "The CIA did not discourage such tactics. To the contrary, the Agency severely criticized me when I admitted to the press that the FDN had regularly kidnapped and executed agrarian reform workers and civilians. We were told that the only way to defeat the Sandinistas was to use the tactics the Agency attributed to 'Communist' insurgencies elsewhere: kill, kidnap, rob and torture." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 27.)

Such madness was not without its method. It had a very clear purpose. Commander Carrión testified that,

> "All of these terrorist instructions have the main purpose of alienating the population from the Government through creating a climate of terror and fear so that nobody would dare to support the Government." (P. 17, supra.)

In order to instruct the contra forces in these tactics the CIA prepared a manual called Psychological Operations in Guerrilla Warfare. It is before the Court in Annex G. The CIA's authorship of this document was publicly confirmed by, among other authoritative sources, the Intelligence Committee of the United States House of Representatives (Ann. E, Attachment 17 (Committee Report No. 98-1196, 2 January 1985)). The Court will undoubtedly recall the testimony that Commander Carrión gave on 12 September when he read aloud excerpts from this manual, especially from the section that is entitled "Implicit and Explicit Terror" (p. 17, supra). I do not believe it is necessary to quote further from this appalling pamphlet. It is in evidence and it speaks for itself.

The evidence demonstrates that the instructions in the CIA's manual were widely followed, in some cases literally, by the contras. About 2,000 copies were distributed among their forces, and the contents of the manual were discussed at special sessions held by contra units (Supp. Ann. G, para. 28; p. 17, supra). Commander Carrión testified that "There are hundreds of examples of contra activities following the manual's instructions", and he gave several specific examples of local civilian leaders, in some way affiliated with the Nicaraguan Government or the Sandinista Party, who were assassinated by the contras as set out in the manual (p. 18, supra). Mr. Chamorro confirmed the contras' use of the manual:

> "the practices advocated in the manual were employed by FDN troops. Many civilians were killed in cold blood. Many others were tortured, mutilated, raped, robbed or otherwise abused." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 28.)

The reports of various independent human rights organizations, which, as I mentioned earlier, are collected in Annex I, provide the names of victims and specific accounts of their individual tragedies.

The record shows that the contras have continued to follow the recommendations in the manual. As recently as 1 August 1985, contra forces attacked the town of Cuapa and, after making the townspeople report to the centre of town, took 12 local militiamen and town officials and marched them off to a ditch outside the town, where they executed 11 of them, throwing the bodies in the ditch (Supp. Ann. D, No. 36, p. 47).

United States responsibility for acts of terrorism by the contras rests not only on the fact that senior United States officials know what the contras do with the funds, weapons and equipment with which the United States continues to supply them — a fact that Professor Glennon's testimony establishes (p. 78, supra). But United States responsibility rests as well, and to an even greater extent, on the direction and control that the United States exercises over the contra forces and on the United States role in actively setting in motion these acts, especially through the preparation and dissemination of the CIA manual on Psychological Operations in Guerrilla Warfare.

IV. The Government of the United States Has Provided Direct and Critical Combat Support for the Military Operations of the Contras

The evidence not only establishes that the United States directly supports the day-to-day military operations of the contras in the field, it also shows that this support is so critical to the contras that without it, their capacity to operate with any degree of effectiveness would be severely diminished. This combat support includes:

(1) the logistical supply and maintenance of contra forces operating in the field;
(2) the collection, analysis, and utilization of intelligence data, including determination of the precise location of Nicaraguan Government troops; and
(3) the design and operation of field communications, including the provision of sophisticated codes and communications procedures, that enable contra units to co-ordinate their attacks without fear of detection by Nicaraguan Government troops.

The evidence shows that the United States has organized, managed and controlled all logistical arrangements for contra forces in the field. On 12 September, Commander Carrión described this logistical operation, and its relationship to the contras' military activities inside Nicaragua, in considerable detail. He testified that the contras were able to infiltrate and maintain forces deep inside Nicaragua in 1983 and thereafter because:

> "the CIA had perfected their logistic systems, especially because they had given the contras several aeroplanes which they could now use to resupply the military units operating deep within the country" (p. 16, supra).

Commander Carrión testified further that "United States involvement in these air supply operations is very clear", citing: delivery by the United States of the planes used in the supply missions; United States improvements to the airstrip at Aguacate, from where the planes operate; information supplied by a captured member of a contra aeroplane crew, brought down over Nicaragua, and confirmed by other sources which revealed that a United States officer known as Major West co-ordinated the entire supply operation; and that another United States officer was involved in packing the supplies before they were placed on the aeroplane (pp. 16-17, supra).

Commander Carrión's testimony was corroborated by Mr. Chamorro, who testified:

> "The United States Government also made it possible for us to resupply our troops inside Nicaragua, thus permitting them to remain longer inside the country. Under cover of military maneuvers in Honduras during 1983, United States armed forces personnel constructed airstrips, including the one at Aguacate, that, after the CIA provided us with aeroplanes, were instrumental in resupplying our troops." (See also Ann. F, No. 62, p. 110; Ann. F, No. 180, p. 272.)

The evidence shows that the United States also provides the contras on a regular basis, with detailed intelligence reports on the location and movements of government troops. Mr. Chamorro explained how this intelligence is collected and passed on to the contras, and its importance to contra military operations:

"The CIA, working with United States military personnel, operated various electronic interception stations in Honduras for the purpose of intercepting radio and telephonic communications among Nicaraguan Government military units. By means of these interception activities, and by breaking the Nicaraguan Government codes, the CIA was able to determine — and to advise us of — the precise locations of all Nicaraguan Government military units. The information obtained by the CIA in this manner was ordinarily corroborated by overflights of Nicaraguan territory by United States satellites and sophisticated surveillance aircraft. With this information, our own forces knew the areas in which they could safely operate free of government troops. If our units were instructed to do battle with government troops, they knew where to set up ambushes, because the CIA informed them of the precise routes the government troops would take. This type of intelligence was invaluable to us. Without it, our forces would not have been able to operate with any degree of effectiveness inside Nicaragua." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 18.)

The United States Government has openly acknowledged its intelligence gathering activities; in late 1982, for example, Jeane Kirkpatrick, then United States Ambassador to the United Nations, admitted, during a United Nations Security Council debate, that the United States conducted regular reconnaissance flights over Nicaraguan territory (37 UN SCOR (2335th mtg.), p. 48, UN doc. S/PV 2335/Corr.1 (1982)).

The United States also provided the contras with a sophisticated field communications system that was equally critical to their combat operations. As Commander Carrión testified:

"There was much assistance in the communications area. In the first place, the United States provided the contras with very modern and effective military communications systems. They gave them different types of equipment — equipment that is used for communications between the regional commands and the tactical operations command, or strategic command, those are usually PRC-77 back radios which can be carried on the back. Also the use of a shortwave radio, South Quartz is the name of it, and they also give the contras small walkie-talkies for communications among the small units within a task force or regional command. But I would say that the most important assistance in the communications field has been the preparing of some sophisticated codes for the contras to cover their communications. They also prepare for them conversational tables which are simpler codes for less important communications. The contras had no capacity at all for preparing or manufacturing these types of codes." (Pp. 20-21, supra.)

Mr. Chamorro explained the importance of the communications facilities provided by the United States:

"This was critical to our military operations because it enabled various units, or task forces, to communicate with each other, and to co-ordinate their activities, without being detected by the Sandinistas. Without this communications capacity, our forces inside Nicaragua would not have been able to co-ordinate their activities with one another and they would have been unable to launch effective strikes at the designated targets." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 18.)

The dependence of the contra forces on the United States is also demonstrated by the course of contra military operations following each new appropriation of United States funds for their activities. Commander Carrión described this in the following manner:

"At the end of 1982, the contras received new funds from the United States amounting to $30 million. From this date on, we started to notice that a more or less regular pattern was emerging and that was that after every infusion of funds, the contras would launch a new major offensive against my country. The offensive would gradually diminish as the funds were being used up until the new infusion came, when the pattern would repeat itself." (P. 16, supra.)

As I have already mentioned, the fact that there was no contra offensive at the end of 1984 was directly attributable to the refusal of the Congress to appropriate more funds at that time. All evidentiary sources agree — and by that I mean the Nicaraguan Government, the United States Government, and the contras' own spokespersons — that by the end of 1984 the funds most recently appropriated by the Congress — that is in December 1983 — had been exhausted (pp. 22-23, supra; Ann. F, No. 61, p. 109; No. 177, p. 269; No. 115, p. 202; No. 121, p. 210). Perhaps nothing more powerfully demonstrates the contras' complete dependence on the United States than the fact — also agreed on by all sides — that the contras' military operations against Nicaragua dropped off dramatically from the end of 1984 until the Congress resumed funding in June 1985.

In February 1985, in the middle of this period, Enrique Bermudez, the contras' military commander, stated publicly that the failure of the United States Congress to appropriate funds forced the contras to reduce their combat operations by more than half. He said: "Some forces are paralysed. We have had moments of crisis, not all places at once, but problems nonetheless." He said failure of the Congress to renew funding "would have a devasting psychological effect" on the contra forces (Ann. F, No. 177, p. 269). Commander Carrión confirmed this:

"Q.: . . . how could you tell that the absence of additional financial support from the United States resulted in a fall off of activity?

A.: Well, first the decrease in the level of military activity showed up in the daily report we have in my country, Nicaragua; but also from personal interviews and interception of contras' communications we know that there were many contra leaders who were complaining about the lack of supplies. We captured many contras very poorly equipped, uniforms worn out and with very few rounds of ammunition, etc., that make it evident that they were not receiving at least as much supplies as they used to receive years before, but there was even demoralization among the contras forces." (Pp. 22-23, supra.)

During this period, because of legislation enacted by the Congress in October 1984, operational control of the contras was shifted from the CIA to the National Security Council, and Lt. Col. Oliver North of the NSC was placed in charge. Mr. Chamorro has stated that Lt. Col. North assured the contras at their headquarters in Honduras that "the planning of the operations would continue very close to the NSC" (Supp. Ann. D, No. 47, p. 57). Subsequently, according to a senior United States official, the National Security Council did provide planning and exert "tactical influence" over contra military operations, and Lt. Col. North personally gave the contras advice and direction on specific attacks, including, in particular, the assault on a passenger ferryboat that connects the river towns of El Rama and Bluefields (Supp. Ann. D, No. 42, p. 50; No. 55, p. 65). National Security Adviser Robert MacFarlane publicly defended Lt. Col. North's activities; he said: "We had a national interest in keeping in touch with what was going on, and second, in not breaking faith with the freedom fighters" (Supp. Ann. D, No. 50, p. 58). Representative George E. Brown, Jr., a member of the Intelligence Committee of the House of Representatives, stated that the Administration's provision of military advice to the contras violated a now lapsed United States law, but concluded that "If the President wants to use the NSC to operate the war in Nicaragua, I don't think there's any way we can control it" (Supp. Ann. D, No. 42, p. 50).

Representative Anthony Beilenson, another member of the Intelligence Committee of the House of Representatives, said: "It just makes it unmistakably clear that it's our war. They are waging it in every way except with American troops." (Supp. Ann. D, No. 46, p. 54.)

This, of course, is precisely what the evidence in this case conclusively establishes, with one exception: on numerous well-documented occasions military and paramilitary attacks against Nicaragua have been waged directly by American military and intelligence personnel, as Professor Chayes will discuss.

The totality of the evidence, therefore, supports Commander Carrión's characterization of the contras as:

> "an artificial force, artificially set up by the United States, that exists only because it counts on United States direction, on United States training, on United States assistance, on United States weapons, on United States everything. Without that kind of support and direction the contras would simply disband, disorganized, and thus lose their military capacity in a very short time." (Pp. 24-25, supra.)

Very similar testimony was given by General Paul F. Gorman, commanding officer of the United States Southern Command headquarters in Panama, which has responsibility for all United States armed forces in Central America and the Caribbean. General Gorman testified before the Armed Services Committee of the United States Senate on 27 February 1985. He told the Committee that unless the contras received continued support from the United States, "the campaign will begin to peter out, wear down" (Ann. F, No. 188). Without continued support from the United States in all the forms in which it has been given, and is being given, the contra force simply could not survive. While there is abundant evidence in support of this proposition, Mr. Chamorro's testimony, based on his personal knowledge and experience, addresses this point directly, and it is an appropriate place to conclude my remarks:

> "When I agreed to join to FDN in 1981, I had hoped that it would be an organization of Nicaraguans, controlled by Nicaraguans, and dedicated to our own objectives which we ourselves would determine. I joined on the understanding that the United States Government would supply us the means necessary to defeat the Sandinistas and replace them as a government, but I believed that we would be our own masters. I turned out to be mistaken. The FDN turned out to be an instrument of the United States Government and, specifically, of the CIA. It was created by the CIA, it was supplied, equipped, armed and trained by the CIA and its activities — both political and military — were directed and controlled by the CIA. Those Nicaraguans who were chosen by the CIA for leadership positions within the organization — namely, Calero and Bermudez — were those who best demonstrated their willingness to unquestioningly follow the instructions of the CIA. They, like the organization itself, became nothing more than executioner of the CIA's orders. The organization became so thoroughly dependent on the United States Government and its continued support that, if that support were terminated, the organization would not only be incapable of conducting any military or paramilitary activities against Nicaragua, but it would immediately begin to disintegrate. It could not exist without the support and direction of the United States Government." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 30.)

QUESTION PUT BY JUDGE SCHWEBEL

The PRESIDENT: Before I give the floor to Professor Chayes, there is a question that Judge Schwebel would like to ask. As this is a question not to a witness, it could be answered in writing later.

Judge SCHWEBEL: I should like to put a question which in my view flows from Mr. Reichler's argument which he may find it suitable to answer now or subsequently, or which the Agent of Nicaragua may rather prefer to treat, and it is this. I can provisionally accept the claim on the basis of the data as I have so far had time to examine it — there is a great deal still to read — that before December 1981, the bands of the contras were an insignificant force. But my current tentative understanding equally is that the insurgency in El Salvador was insignificant before the Sandinistas came to power in 1979. But thereafter the character, my understanding is, of the insurgency in El Salvador radically changed, so that by January 1981, the insurgents posed a massive challenge to the El Salvador Government. Now it is claimed that the difference in vital measure derived from the Sandinistas who allegedly supplied arms from Nicaragua to El Salvadoran insurgents and who permitted the establishment of the leadership of the Salvadoran insurgents in safe command centres in Nicaragua — I have not heard that allegation contested by the way — and who it is alleged collaborated in the training of insurgents. Then came the January 1981 offensive which was hailed by an insurgent radio station, allegedly operating from Nicaraguan soil, and it is claimed that Radio Managua broadcast this on the day of the offensive:

> "A few hours after the FMLN general command ordered a final offensive to defeat the régime established by the military christian democratic junta, the first victories in the combat waged by our forces began being reported."

And that claim broadcast from Managua radio is found in Revolution Beyond our Borders, Sandinista Intervention in Cental America, at page 20, a publication of the United States Department of State of this month.

It is argued that this Nicaraguan collaboration on the organization of the insurgency in El Salvador preceded by more than a year the organization by the United States of the insurgency in Nicaragua. In a sense then, there is an argument of mirror images, except the first image to appear in the mirror, it is argued, is that of Nicaragua. Could the Agent or counsel of Nicaragua comment on that line of argument which I do not necessarily accept but which I am obliged by the intendment of Article 53 of the Statute to consider?

Mr. ARGÜELLO GÓMEZ: Mr. President, Judge Schwebel. As with many questions raised in the past days, I feel it my duty as an Agent to answer them in my Agent's speech. I think it in any case more appropriate, due to the nature of the question, that as Agent I should answer than that the lawyers should answer.

Professor CHAYES: Mr. President, Members of the Court. As I said at the outset, I will deal with the last four of the eight central propositions that we feel are demonstrated by the evidence. Like Mr. Reichler, I will not burden the Court with extensive citations, but the references to the evidence have been supplied to the Registrar and will appear at the appropriate points in the transcript.

V. The Political Leadership of the Contras Was Hand-Picked, Installed and Paid by the United States, Both to Ensure Control and to Generate Congressional and Public Support for the Administration's Policy

The most cogent evidence about the political arm of the FDN is to be found in the affidavit of Mr. Chamorro who was a participant in the events from the summer of 1981 until November 1984, when he was fired by the CIA. Most of that time he was a member of the political directorate. I am going to follow along in Mr. Chamorro's own words and there will be citations to the principal corroborating evidence.

Mr. Reichler has already described the origin of the FDN in a merger, dictated by the CIA, between the Union Democratica Nicaraguense, a group of Nicaraguan exiles in the United States, loosely organized under the leadership of José Fransisco Cardenal, and bands of ex-National Guardsmen who had been conducting sporadic raids along the Honduran border since the fall of Somoza. The merger took place in August 1981 and a political junta consisting of Cardenal and two others was established by the CIA.

In little more than a year, the junta had outlived its usefulness. Cardenal resigned because he found "that he had no control over Bermudez or the other members of the FDN general staff, who answered only to the CIA" (Supp. Ann. G, para. 10). Mr. Chamorro recounts how he was approached in November 1982 by a CIA agent who purported to be "speaking in the name of the President of the United States". The agent asked him "to become a member of the political directorate of the FDN, which the CIA had decided to create as a substitute for the political junta" (Supp. Ann. G, para. 11; see also Ann. F, No. 191, p. 293). The reason was,

> "that the FDN had a bad image in the United States, and particularly among members of Congress, because it was perceived as an organization of ex-National Guardsmen. He told me that in order to maintain the support of the Congress for the CIA's activities it was necessary to replace the political junta with a group of prominent Nicaraguan citizens who had no ties with the National Guard or the Somoza Government." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 11.)

A Newsweek article published at the same time reports that "contra attacks are designed to harass the Sandinistas while CIA operatives cast around for a moderate new Nicaraguan leadership" (Ann. F, No. 13, p. 22).

The size of the new directorate was set at seven because the CIA felt that "any larger group would be unmanageable". Although the agents discussed possible candidates with Mr. Chamorro, "it was obvious" he says, "that they had already decided who they wanted" (Supp. Ann. G, para. 13; see also Ann. F, No. 191, p. 293; ibid., No. 188, p. 285). The new leadership was organized in haste because, "the CIA was worried that Congress might enact legislation" as in fact it did,

> "to prohibit the use of United States funds for the purpose of overthrowing the Nicaraguan Government, and the creation of a political directorate composed of prominent respectable citizens might persuade the Congress not to enact such legislation" (Supp. Ann. G, para. 13).

The policies and programme of the organization were dictated by the CIA. The initial statement of principles and goals was rewritten by a CIA officer and Mr. Chamorro says "I had to read his words" at a press conference held on 8 December 1982. "In January 1983, at the instruction of CIA agent Thomas Castillo, we put out a 12-point 'peace initiative' drafted by the CIA which essentially demanded the surrender of the Sandinista government." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 14.)

The CIA paid the political leadership of the FDN from the very beginning. Cardenal began receiving payments from the first half of 1981 (Supp. Ann. G, para. 6). Mr. Chamorro tells us that "The CIA paid me a salary of $2,000 a month to support myself and family, plus expenses. Similar arrangements were made with other FDN directors." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 15; Ann. F, Nos. 149, 191, pp. 239, 293.)

A principal function of the directorate, as far as the CIA was concerned, was to influence United States opinion and the United States Congress. The organization continued to be heavily engaged in promoting legislation for funding the contras:

> "Our CIA colleagues enlisted us in an effort to 'lobby' the Congress to resume these appropriations. I attended meetings at which CIA officials told us that we could change the vote of many members of Congress if we knew how to 'sell' our case and place them in the position of 'looking soft on Communism'. They told us exactly what to say and which members of Congress to say it to. They also instructed us to contact certain prominent individuals in the home districts of various members of Congress as a means of bringing pressure on these members to change their votes." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 26; see also Ann. F, Nos. 149, 187, pp. 239, 281.)

Mr. Chamorro also tells us how, when he was managing the FDN's communications office in Honduras, he was given money from the CIA "to bribe Honduran journalists and broadcasters to write and speak favourably about the FDN and to attack the Government of Nicaragua and call for its overthrow". He learned from the CIA that the same tactics were being used in Costa Rica (Supp. Ann. G, para. 16). The Court will recall Mr. MacMichael's testimony that it was a common technique for the Agency to plant such stories abroad and then get them reprinted in United States newspapers as an aspect of the element of "disinformation" that is part of every covert programme (p. 56, supra).

The judgment and wishes of the Nicaraguans were repeatedly overridden by their American masters. Chamorro thought that the January 1983 peace offer "was premature, but Castillo insisted that it be done to get the FDN favourable publicity" (Supp. Ann. G, para. 16). The directorate was not even permitted to select their own headquarters.

> "We wanted to set up a highly visible headquarters in a shopping centre > or office building, but the CIA did not like this idea. They said it would become a target for demonstrations and violence. They insisted that we take an elegant suite at the David Williams Hotel in Coral Gables, Florida, which the CIA paid for." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 15.)

The CIA installed as the real leader of the directorate "another Nicaraguan", recently arrived from Nicaragua where he "had been working for the CIA . . . for a long time" (Supp. Ann. G, para. 14; Ann. F, No. 188, p. 285), that was Mr. Calero. Captain Armando Lopez, head of contra logistics said of Mr. Calero's appointment: "The benefactor had to find something to guarantee his investment." (Ann. F, No. 196, p. 299.)

The political directorate was also forced to cover for the CIA when, as I shall describe below, the United States launched its campaign of direct attacks against Nicaraguan harbours, ports and oil storage facilities in the Fall of 1983. "Although the FDN had nothing whatsoever to do with this operation, we were instructed by the CIA to publicly claim responsibility in order to cover the CIA's involvement." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 21.) False press releases were issued on CIA orders after the attacks on Puerto Sandino in September and October 1983, the attack on Corinto in October 1983, and the attacks on Potosi in January 1984. On 5 January 1984, Mr. Chamorro says:

> "at 2.00 a.m. the CIA deputy station chief of Tegucigalpa woke me up at my house in Tegucigalpa and handed me a press release in excellent Spanish. I was surprised to read that we — the FDN — were taking credit for having mined several Nicaraguan harbours." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 24.)

The Agency wooed Edén Pastora, who remained outside the FDN, because it thought his record as a former Sandinista leader would make him politically attractive. In the end, it decided that he was "unmanageable" (Ann. F, No. 188, p. 285) and terminated funds to his Revolutionary Democratic Alliance Group (ARDE). Pastora's comment was: "I had only one problem with the CIA, I did not speak English well enought to say 'Yes, Sir'" (ibid., p. 284).

Mr. Chamorro also fell victim to the CIA insistence on control. In early 1984 he became increasingly troubled by reports of contra atrocities. His objections were ignored until finally, in June 1984,

> "I acknowledged to a newspaper reporter that our troops had killed some civilians and executed some prisoners, though I tried to explain these practices as best I could. Calero told me I could no longer work in Honduras and I was re-assigned to the local FDN committee in Miami. I was given nothing to do and I no longer had much interest in working for the FDN, or to be more accurate, for the CIA." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 29.)

In November 1984 he was fired (ibid., para. 31).

Mr. Reichler has already read the closing paragraphs of Mr. Chamorro's affidavit recording his disillusioned realization that the organization he helped to found "turned out to be an instrument of the United States Government and, specifically, of the CIA" (Supp. Ann. G, para. 30).

VI. United States Military and Intelligence Personnel Conducted Direct Attacks Against Nicaragua, Including the Destruction of Its Oil Supplies and Supply Facilities and the Mining of Its Harbours

In the summer of 1983, the CIA was seeking "a quicker and more effective way of hurting the Sandinistas than previous efforts" (Ann. F, No. 51, p. 94).

As a result, they hired and trained a special group of commandos, known as Unilaterally Controlled Latino Assets (UCLAs), to carry out a series of attacks against Nicaraguan ports, power plants, bridges and oil facilities. As is indicated by their name, these UCLAs were employees of the United States Government and were under the CIA's direct control (Ann. F, No. 48, p. 89; No. 70, p. 121; No. 100, p. 171; No. 188, p. 286).

Mr. Chamorro described a meeting during that period, that is the summer of 1983, between the FDN political directorate and Duane Clarridge, the CIA manager of the cover operation. Here is his description:

> "Clarridge told us that the C.I.A. had decided that something must be done to cut off Nicaragua's oil supplies, because without oil the Nicaraguan military would be immobilized and its capacity to resist our forces would be drastically reduced. Clarridge spoke of various alternatives. He said the agency was considering a plan 'to sink ships' bringing oil to Nicaragua . . . and 'an attack on Nicaragua's sole oil refinery, located near Managua . . . Finally, Clarridge said that the Agency had decided on a plan to attack the oil pipeline at Puerto Sandino, on Nicaragua's Pacific Coast where the oil tankers delivering oil to Nicaragua discharge their cargoes." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 20.)

Operations under this plan began on 8 September 1983, when the UCLAs, true to Clarridge's word, blew up the Puerto Sandino pipeline (Supp. Ann. G, para. 21; Carrión testimony, p. 21, supra; see also Ann. F, No. 98, p. 168; No. 99, p. 169; Nos. 192-193, pp. 295-297; Supp. Ann. B, para. 21; Ann. J, Attachment 1).

On 10 October 1983, the UCLAs executed a more ambitious attack on Corinto, Nicaragua's main port. Commander Carrión testified:

> "In October of that same year several speedboats armed with 20-millimetre cannons attacked oil storage facilities in the port of Corinto, which . . . is the main port of Nicaragua. As a result of the attack the three big oil-storage tanks were set on fire. This fire was a very big one and put in peril the whole Corinto population, which is around 20,000 people, and they had to be evacuated from the town to some place else. Many millions of gallons of oil were lost, and the oil storage tanks were completely destroyed." (P. 21, supra; see also Supp. Ann. G, para. 21; Ann. F, No. 50, p. 92; No. 98, p. 168; No. 99, p. 169; Nos. 192-193, pp. 295-297.)

On 14 October the UCLAs returned to Puerto Sandino, and again attacked the pipeline there. In all, there were three attempts to blow up that pipeline (p. 21, supra; see also Ann. J, Attachment 1).

Therafter, between 1 January and 10 April 1984, the CIA carried out at least 19 separate attacks on a variety of Nicaraguan coastal economic targets. The UCLA operated from armed CIA speedboats and helicopters directed by United States intelligence and military personnel aboard a CIA ship stationed just outside Nicaraguan territorial waters (Ann. F, No. 72, p. 125; No. 81, p. 140; No. 94, p. 160; No. 104, p. 176; No. 116, p. 203; No. 191, p. 292). When CIA Director William Casey was asked who was directing the operation and picking the targets, he answered, "We are". (Ann. F, No. 105, p. 188.)

An internal CIA memorandum describes these attacks and provides detailed evidence of the United States role (Ann. C, Attachment III-3). For example, the first entry on that memorandum describes the attack on the Nicaraguan naval base at Potosi on 4 January 1984, as follows:

> "Helicopter rockets and 'Q' boat ('Q' boat was the name for the speedboat)

> attack against the Potosi naval base . . . 'Q' boat crewed by agents and personnel from Central America. United States helicopter and crew identified targets which were taken under fire by Nicaraguan crewed helicopter. CIA crewed Merlin aircraft equipped with FLIR (forward looking infrared radar) provided real time intelligence support.
> Major terminal was hit several times by 'Q' boat cannon fire . . . Rockets set fire and caused damage to buildings within the compound. Nicaraguans admitted to one dead and eight wounded." (Ann. C, Attachment III-3.)

The accounts of the other attacks are equally vivid and equally candid.

Meanwhile, a plan including the mining of Nicaragua's ports was presented to President Reagan with the strong recommendation of National Security Adviser Robert C. McFarlane. It was specifically approved by the President in December 1983 (Ann. F, Nos. 81, 94, 104, pp. 140, 161, 179; see also Ann. E, Attachment 9). It was an integral part of the operation against Nicaraguan ports and shipping facilities that was already under way.

The Central Intelligence Agency carried out the mining from January to April of 1984. The mines were made by the CIA Weapons Group and tested by the Mines Division of the Naval Surface Weapons Center of the United States Navy. They were deployed, as in the earlier attacks, by the specially trained UCLAs (Ann. F, No. 72, p. 125; No. 81, p. 140; No. 94, p. 160; No. 104, p. 176; No. 116, p. 203; No. 191, p. 292; see also Supp. Ann. G, para. 21).

When the United States role in the operations was made public in April 1984, one member of the Senate Intelligence Committee reacted:

> "We have carefully monitored these activities to insure that whatever else happened, Americans didn't get into combat-type operations against Nicaragua . . . That distinction has been lost. When an American is on the mother ship in a mining operation, he's involved directly in military activities." (Ann. F, No. 72, p. 125; see also No. 89, p. 153, No. 190, p. 289.)

Senator Goldwater was more succinct: "This is an act violating international law. It is an act of war." (Ann. E, Attachment 9.)

Judge Jennings expressed an interest in the duration of the mining. The mines were first deployed on 4 January 1984, and deployment continued through the end of March (Ann. F, No. 190, p. 289). The first mine exploded on 25 February 1984; the last on 30 March 1984 (Ann. J, Attachment 1). However, Administration and congressional sources said in early April that "these mines will remain active in Nicaraguan harbours until they decay in several months" (Ann. F, No. 87, p. 15).

Commander Carrión testified that 12 vessels and fishing trawlers were damaged by the mines. Two persons were killed and 14 injured (p. 22, supra; see also Ann. F, No. 104, p. 176; No. 191, p. 292).

Although Nicaragua has not yet presented comprehensive proof in support of its claim for compensation, there is a considerable body of evidence in this record concerning the economic damage caused by these attacks. In 1983 80 per cent of all Nicaraguan foreign trade passed through Nicaraguan ports and almost all this activity was through Corinto or Puerto Sandino. Oil imports play a particularly important role, accounting for 40 per cent of the foreign exchange Nicaragua earns through its exports (Ann. J, Attachment 1). In addition to the oil supplies actually destroyed in the contra attacks, Exxon stopped sending its tankers into Nicaraguan ports after the raid on Corinto (Ann. F, No. 188, p. 287). The very existence of the mines and the uncertainties about their deactivation hampered Nicaraguan trade and jeopardized the delivery of Nicaraguan oil supplies for some months (Ann. F, No. 125, p. 214).

As I pointed out above, the evidence shows that the contras never had anything to do with either the mining or the other UCLA attacks. Mr. Chamorro was instructed by the CIA to read the press release claiming responsibility for the mining over the FDN clandestine radio (Supp. Ann. G, para. 24), thereby allowing the CIA to conceal the United States direct military action against Nicaragua for many months.

Other forms of direct United States action against Nicaragua include a variety of activities expressly designed to intimidate the Nicaraguan people and Government. The United States has conducted military manœuvres in Honduras almost continuously since February 1983. These manœuvres are on an unprecedented scale, involving thousands of United States soldiers, tanks and heavy artillery. Many have been accompanied by simultaneous naval manœuvres executed by aircraft carriers, battleships and destroyers off Nicaragua's coasts. Commander Carrión described some of these actions in his testimony (p. 22, supra); they are also documented elsewhere in the record (Ann. F, No. 41, p. 76, No. 150, p. 240; Supp. Ann. D, No. 10, pp. 11-13; No. 169, p. 261).

The evidence shows that these manœuvres were conceived as part of a programme of "perception management", a term coined apparently by the CIA or the Defense Department, intended to alarm and intimidate the Nicaraguan Government. This programme was outlined in a classified 1983 Defense Department document: the title of the document was Document on Central American Initiatives. The existence of the programme was confirmed by senior Defense Department and Administration officials: "Every time there's an invasion scare, they (the Nicaraguans) make some concessions." Or again, "We do our best to keep them concerned." Or again, "One of the central purposes (of the manœuvres) is to create fear of an invasion. (The American troops) push very close to the border, deliberately, to set off all the alarms." (Ann. F, No. 199, p. 303.) In June 1985, United States Colonel Pearcy, Joint Task Force Commander in Honduras, said that the manœuvres were partially intended to remind Nicaragua of American resolve (Supp. Ann. D, No. 10, p. 11).

Another component of the "perception management" programme was a series of overflights by a United States SR-71 reconnaissance 'plane causing sonic booms over Managua for four consecutive days in November 1984, at a time when the United States Administration was deliberately creating tensions between the two countries (p. 22, supra; Ann. F, No. 152, p. 242). Otto J. Reich, Ambassador for Latin American Public Diplomacy, confirmed that these booms were intended to frighten the people of Nicaragua (Ann. F, No. 199, p. 302).

VII. The Activities of the United States Reflect Policy Decisions and Priorities Established at the Highest Levels of the Current Administration and Executed under Its Supervision. In no Sense Can they Be Regarded as an Abberration or as the Unauthorized Activities of Subordinates

The evidence shows unequivocally, and Mr. Reichler has already recounted some of it, that the fundamental decisions in the United States military and paramilitary campaign against Nicaragua were made by the President of the United States personally, on the recommendation of senior cabinet secretaries and advisers. This is true not only as a matter of fact, but it is required by the positive provisions of United States law. I quote from Title 22 of the United States Code, section 2422:

> "No funds appropriate the authority of this chapter of any other Act may be expended by or on behalf of the Central Intelligence Agency for operations [that's what covert activities are called] in foreign countries, . . . unless and until the President finds that each such operation is important to the national security of the United States." (Ann. D, Attachment 2. Emphasis added.)

Title 50 of the US Code, section 413, states: "The finding must be reported to the Intelligence Committees of both the Senate and the House of Representatives." (Ibid.)

As Mr. Reichler has already said, the initial contra programme was approved by the President at a meeting of the National Security Council on 16 November 1981 (Ann. F, No. 4, pp. 6-7). It was embodied in National Security Decision Directive 17 (ibid., No. 23, p. 48). The presidential finding required by law was made on 1 December 1981 (ibid., No. 8; No. 13, p. 23; No. 187, p. 193; No. 36, p. 69). Subsequent major increases in the authorized force ceilings or changes in the force mission were also authorized by the President and reported to the appropriate congressional committees in accordance with this law (Ann. F, No. 8, p. 115; No. 13, p. 23).

Pursuant to the same law, the President, in December 1983, personally approved the destruction of Nicaraguan oil facilities and the mining of Nicaraguan harbours carried out over the next several months (Ann. F, No. 94, p. 16; No. 104, p. 179), although there is some question of how adequately that was reported to the Intelligence Committees. But in the end, Senator Goldwater, Chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, said in a public letter to Director Casey of the Central Intelligence Agency, "the CIA had, with the personal approval of the President, engaged in such mining" (Ann. E, Attachment 9; see also Ann. E, Attachment 8; Ann. F, No. 81, p. 140; No. 94, pp. 160-161).

By the same token, the Congress of the United States is a party to these policy decisions. As noted above, the applicable statute requires that the Intelligence Committees of both Houses be informed. In 1982, Congress secretly approved $30 million for the "covert war" (Ann. E, Attachment 1, House Intelligence Report, IV, p. 249). Since at least fiscal year 1984 (beginning 1 October 1983), all funds for the contras had been specifically and openly authorized by legislation enacted by the Congress (see Ann. D, Attachments 3, 4; Supp. Ann. C, Attachment 7). Congress was on ample notice, from the public statements of senior members of the Intelligence Committees exercising their functions of reporting to their colleagues before each such appropriation, as to the purposes for which the funds were to be used. For example, Representative Lee Hamilton, then a member of the House Intelligence Committee and now its Chairman, stated:

> "The contras aim to bring down the Sandinistas. We are now supporting a large army inside Nicaragua. We can no longer deny that we are fighting a mercenary war in Nicaragua to overthrow the Government of that country." (Ann. C, Attachment 3, 239 Cong. Rec. H5725, 27 July 1983.)

Although it was sometimes suggested that the CIA was out of control, Senator Goldwater firmly rejected that notion: "The CIA is like the rest of our intelligence family, a member of the Government, and they only do what they are told to do." (Ann. E, Attachment 15, p. S12865.)

Senator Wallop, also a member of the Senate Intelligence Committee, concurred:

> "They (the CIA) are not ginning up, generating, concocting what they are doing in Nicaragua on their own, without directions from the Reagan > Administration. [I should say that Senator Wallop is a Republican and supports the policy.] Nor did they do so in the Carter Administration. They are doing what they are directed to do because they are an arm of United States foreign policy." (Ann. E, Attachment 15, p. S12865.)

Involvement at the highest levels of the United States Government was not confined to the mere authorization of actions. The evidence reveals that senior White House officials and other high officers of the Administration have been concerned with the on-going operations on an almost day-to-day basis. The mining plan, as I said, was approved on the affirmative recommendation of National Security Adviser Robert C. MacFarlane. CIA Director William Casey made many visits to the contras in Nicaragua, and once in 1983 he assured them personally that the Administration would stay with them. Indeed, one intelligence officer said "It's really Casey's war" (Ann. F, No. 161, p. 251).

A "restricted interagency group", known as the RIG, was formed to manage and supervise the operation. It was chaired by the Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, first Thomas Anders and later Langhorn Mobley. Marine Corps Lt. Col. Oliver C. North, Deputy Director of the National Security Council for Political Military Affairs, represented the White House. You have already heard of his activities from Mr. Reichler. Duane Clarridge, Director of the CIA's Office of Latin American Affairs, sat for the Agency.

Clarridge, also known as "Dewey Maroni" — his "nom de guerre" I suppose — was the day-to-day manager and moving spirit of the programme. His pervasive involvement with the contra operation is detailed in Annex F, Numbers 187, 188, 190, 191 and 193.

He made frequent trips to Honduras for meetings with contra field commanders, he negotiated with Edén Pastora to induce him to join, and he masterminded the establishment of the FDN political directorate (Supp. Ann. G, paras. 20-22; Ann. F, Nos. 187, 188, 191, 193). He "reported directly to Casey throughout, bypassing several senior officers in the intelligence communities' senior command, and he and Casey overrode whatever objections cropped up" (Ann. F, No. 187, p. 283).

Colonel North was also directly involved in FDN activities, but Mr. Reichler has already dealt with that. Another National Security Council official, Ronald F. Lehman, a Special Assistant to the President, and, I believe, brother to the Secretary of the Navy, visited the FDN leadership in Nicaragua in the spring of 1984 and assured them:

> "that President Reagan remained committed to removing the Sandinistas from power. He told us that President Reagan was unable at the time to publicly express the full extent of his commitment to us because of the upcoming presidential elections in the United States. But, Mr. Lehman told us, as soon as the elections were over, President Reagan would publicly endorse our effort to remove the Sandinistas from power and see to it that we received all the support that was necessary for that purpose." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 25.)

In 1985, the military and paramilitary activities against Nicaragua have become a major preoccupation of the current Administration and of President Reagan himself. Congressman Lee Hamilton, Chairman of the House Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence said:

The Administration's heaviest artillery has been brought into play. Vice President Bush spoke in behalf of the contras on 25 January and again on 28 February. Mr. Casey spoke at the Metropolitan Club on 1 May and Secretary Shultz before the American Bar Association on 23 May (Supp. Ann. B, Attachment II-1).

President Reagan himself played a leading role in the final decision by Congress to restore funding for the contras on 12 June 1985. Between 7 February and 11 June, he made 22 separate major public statements, regarding aid to the contras and the need for changing the Nicaraguan Government (Ann. C, Attachments 11-21; Supp. Ann. B. Attachments 1-9; additions to Supp. Ann. B). He repeatedly referred to the contras as "freedom fighters" (see, e.g., Ann. C, Attachments I-5, IV, p. 172; I-13, IV, pp. 182-183; I-14, IV, pp. 183-184; I-15, IV, p. 185). He compared them with "the brave men and women of the French resistance" (Ann. C, Att. I-15, p. 4); he asserted that "they are our brothers" (Ann. C, Att. I-13; I-15, p. 4) and claimed them as "the moral equivalent of our founding fathers" (Ann. C, Att. I-15, p. 4).

The military and paramilitary activities of a 10,000-man covert army in a small country in Central America have evoked from the United States Government preoccupation — one might say almost obsession — at the highest levels; lavish expenditure of resources — a hundred million dollars in four years; and day-to-day supervision by senior operational officials. In the light of this combination it is hard to contend that the United States is not firmly in charge of the operations.

VIII. The Purpose of the Policy and the Actions Against Nicaragua Undertaken in Pursuance of It Was, from the Beginning, to Overthrow the Government of Nicaragua

Evidence in the record from a multitude of sources, both direct and indirect, is consistent and mutually corroborative that the overriding purpose of the United States military and paramilitary operations against Nicaragua was to destabilize the Government, force it to change its basic social policies, and ultimately to overthrow it. The notion that the programme was designed to interdict, or suppress, an alleged flow of arms from Nicaragua to the insurgents in El Salvador finds no basis in the record. The evidence supports Mr. MacMichael's testimony that the arms interdiction rationale was developed as a cover story to conceal the real purpose of the programme (pp. 49-51, 58, supra). This, in itself, reinforces the direct evidence establishing the true purpose of the operation.

The evidence of purpose falls into a number of categories and I will now deal with each of them separately.

A. Presidential Statements

The most explicit and notorious of these is the President's press conference answer, on 21 February 1985, to the direct question whether the purpose of United States policy in Nicaragua was to overthrow the Government. He replied: "Not if the present government would turn around and say, all right, if they'd say 'Uncle'." (Ann. C, Att. I-14, IV, p. 184.) Now, we have supplied a reference to a dictionary definition of that phrase "say 'Uncle'", and I think that is probably not necessary, but of course it is a colloquialism for surrender. When asked whether the goal of the United States policy was to "remove the Sandinista government", he answered:

> "Well, removed in the sense of its present structure, in which it is a communist totalitarian State, and it is not a government chosen by the people." (Ann. C, Attachment I-14, IV, p. 183.)

Numerous presidential statements only slightly less specific reiterate the same theme under a number of rubrics, for example, there are repeated references to the contras as "freedom fighters" (Ann. C, Attachments I-5, IV, p. 173; I-13, IV, p. 182; I-14, IV, p. 183; I-15, p. 4). There are repeated assertions that the Sandinistas are not a government, but merely a "faction" of the 1979 revolution (Ann. C, Attachment I-16, IV, p. 185; Attachment I-11, IV, p. 180; Attachment I-12, IV, p. 181; Supp. Ann. B, Attachment 4, IV, p. 383), and there are references to the need for "changing" the existing "totalitarian" régime into a "democratic" one (Ann. C, Attachment I-4, IV, p. 171; Attachment I-11, IV, p. 180; Attachment I-12, IV, p. 181; Attachment I-14, IV, p. 184; Supp. Ann. B, Attachment I-2, IV, p. 380; Attachment I-4, IV, p. 383; Attachment I-8). Most of these, incidentally, have emerged since the United States decided not to appear in this Court and was no longer so heavily under the obligation of maintaining the notion of collective self-defence.

B. Statements by Other High Administration Officials

The principal foreign policy officers of the current United States Administration have repeatedly used the same formulas as the President to describe the purpose of United States policy: for example, Vice President Bush, on 25 January 1985: "our support for those in Nicaragua who are fighting the communist Sandinistas must go forward" (Ann. C, Attachment II-8, IV, p. 214); Secretary of State George Shultz, 20 March 1984: "I also call upon the Congress to recognize the validity of the struggle of those Nicaraguans who are resisting totalitarianism" (Ann. C, Attachment II-3, IV, pp. 201-202). Secretary Shultz said on 19 February 1985:

> "What we have in Nicaragua is a government that's a bad-news government. Now, how can that get changed? We'd like to see them change. But they don't seem inclined to do so. So we have followed these alternatives and we will continue to follow these alternatives." (Ann. F, No. 176; see also id., No. 175.)

Director of Central Intelligence William Casey said on 1 May 1985:

> "The increasingly united Democratic Nicaraguan Opposition, both internal and external, is the major obstacle to Sandinista consolidation. The armed resistance, popularly known as the contras, is a vital part of this movement. Together, these groups encourage erosion of support for the Sandinistas; create uncertainties about the future of the régime; challenge its claims to legitimacy; and give hope to the Nicaraguan people." (Supp. Ann. B, Attachment II-1, IV, p. 391.)

In the same speech, Mr. Casey referred to Nicaragua as an "occupied country" (p. 2). The Court may note also statements of other high Administration officials which are contained in the evidence. (Under Secretary of Defense Fred C. Ikle (12 September 1983), Ann. C, Attachment II-2; Assistant Secretary of State for Inter-American Affairs, Elliott Abrams (17 August 1985), Supp. Ann. D, Attachment 58; Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Inter-American Affairs, Nestor D. Sanchez (27 August 1985), Add. to Supp. Ann. D. See also, generally, Ann. F, No. 58.)

C. Congressional Statements

That is the third category. Presidential statements, statements of high officials, Congressional statements. The record abounds in statements by senior members of the Congressional Intelligence Committee, both supporters and opponents of the Administration's policy affirming that its purpose has been to overthrow the Nicaraguan Government. Only a few can be given here. As early as May 1983, the report of the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence of the House of Representatives said:

> "The activities and the purposes of the anti-Sandinista insurgents ultimately shape the program. Their openly acknowledged goal of overthrowing the Sandinistas, the size of their forces and efforts to increase such forces, and finally their activities now and while they were on the Nicaraguan-Honduran border, point not to arms interdiction, but to military confrontation." (Ann. E, Attachment 1, IV, pp. 251-252.)

The next statement of 23 July 1983 is from Representative Edward Boland who was then Chairman of the House Intelligence Committee: "the purpose and mission of the operation was to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua" (Ann. E, Attachment 3, p. H5748).

Here is a statement from Senator Malcolm Wallop, a supporter of the programme and a member of the Senate Intelligence Subcommittee:

> "I would hope that we do not give the erroneous impression that we have fostered the Nicaraguan assistance program solely to interdict arms for the war in El Salvador. That would cheapen both our motives and those of the Nicaraguans freedom fighting." (Ann. E, Attachment 15, p. S12865.)

Senator Patrick Leahy, Vice Chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, opened the debate on funding for Nicaragua on the floor of the Senate on 23 April 1985 as follows:

> "Mr. President, today the Senate is considering the most important foreign policy issue it will face this year: whether Congress will allow President Reagan to continue a covert war to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua." (Supp. Ann. C, Attachment 1, p. S4581.)

And finally, Mr. Lee Hamilton, Chairman of the House Intelligence Committee, said in the same debate in the House:

> "On February 21, President Reagan said that it was United States policy to seek to remove the Sandinista Government unless it changed its goals and present structure and allowed the contras into the government." (Ibid., Supp. Ann. C, Attachment 2, pp. 2358-2359.)

D. Statements Made to the Contra Leaders

The contra leaders themselves say that they were told often by officials representing themselves as speaking for the President, that the objective was to overthrow the existing government of Nicaragua by force. "Managua by Christmas" was a familiar slogan among the contras (Ann. F, No. 188, p. 286; id., No. 191, p. 293).

E. Strategy, Tactics and Targets of the Field Operations

The actual operations of the contras in the field are wholly inconsistent with the asserted purpose of arms interdiction. On the contrary, they are clearly designed and co-ordinated so as to sap the political and economic strength of the Government of Nicaragua.

First, the terrorism and atrocities, for which the evidence has already been reviewed by Mr. Reichler, are classic destabilizing tactics.

Secondly, again as explained by Mr. Reichler, a major objective of the annual offensives launched by the contras was to take and hold an area within Nicaragua where they could proclaim a provisional government that contra leaders were assured would be recognized by the United States (p. 16, supra; Supp. Ann. G, para. 22; Ann. F, No. 156, p. 246).

Thirdly, contra hit-and-run tactics were directed at targets of economic significance, including bridges, communications installations, the international airport at Managua and agricultural co-operatives. As CIA Director Casey said, commenting on the first of these attacks on the bridges on the Rio Negro and Rio Ocotal: "It takes relatively few people and little support to disrupt the internal peace and economic stability of a small country." (Ann. F, No. 36, p. 71.) The destruction of health and education facilities, which were also specially targeted for hit-and-run attacks, was similar in purpose (p. 17, supra; Ann. E, Attachment 5, H8416; Supp. Ann. D, No. 51, p. 94).

In 1984, as Commander Carrión testified, there was a special systematic effort to disrupt Nicaragua's export industries, in particular to prevent the harvesting and marketing of the coffee crop (Supp. Ann. G, para. 19; pp. 18-19, supra; Ann. I, Attachment 2, pp. 1-19).

Next, the direct actions by the United States against Puerto Sandino, Corinto and Potosi and the programme of mining Nicaragua's harbours were designed to disrupt the economy and intimidate both the Government and the people. Senator Leahy whom we have heard before said: "There's a lot of talk about not trying to overthrow the Government, but the facts speak for themselves. Unless you are trying to do this, why else would you mine their harbours?" (Ann. F, No. 80, p. 139.) The attacks, indeed, were part of a deliberate and systematic plan to destroy Nicaragua's oil-supply system. The campaign of perception management and intimidation, including the SR-71 sonic booms and the massive United States force deployments near Nicaragua's land and sea borders, were similarly intended. Now the last type of evidence demonstrating the purpose of the operation is sort of negative evidence.

F. The Evidence in the Record Provides no Support for the Proposition that Nicaragua Is Supplying Arms to the Insurgents in El Salvador

Under the terms of Article 53 of the Statute, the Applicant is in something of an odd position on this matter. The only legal justification ever advanced by the United States for its military and paramilitary activities against Nicaragua is that they represent an exercise of the inherent right of self-defense against the asserted supply of arms by Nicaragua to the guerrillas in El Salvador. In law, of course, this is a matter of affirmative defence. In a normal case, where the respondent had not refused to participate, the matter would not be before the Court at all unless the respondent formally placed it in issue in its pleadings. The respondent would have to support its allegations with concrete and specific proof and it would bear the burden of proof. Applicant would then have a full and fair opportunity to rebut the actual evidence relied on, and the Court would resolve any conflict on the basis of the record made by the parties.

Here Nicaragua must respond to shadows — vague and unsubstantiated assertions by the United States, made in other contexts and forums, without any specification of concrete evidence to support them. Nevertheless, in view of the provisions of Article 53, Nicaragua has felt it incumbent on it to try to assist the Court as best it can to deal with these scattered accusations and assertions.

Let us review the evidence of record on the issue of the supply of arms by Nicaragua to the Salvadoran rebels.

In the first place, the Government of Nicaragua maintains and has always maintained that it has never at any time supplied arms to the Salvadoran rebels. Father Miguel d'Escoto, Foreign Minister of Nicaragua, solemnly swore in his affidavit filed in this case:

> "In truth, my government is not engaged, and has not been engaged, in the provision of arms or supplies to either of the factions engaged in the civil war in El Salvador." (Ann. B, para. 1.)

The affidavit continues with a description of the efforts of the Nicaraguan Government — both unilateral and diplomatic — to suppress arms traffic across its territory and the difficulties attendant on that task. I think you will find those efforts to have been diligent.

Commander Luis Carrión, Vice Minister of the Interior of Nicaragua, and a member of the Government since 19 July 1979, when the Somoza régime was overthrown, testified in open Court, under the solemn declaration prescribed by Article 64 of the Rules:

> "My Government has never had a policy of sending arms to opposition forces in Central America. That does not mean that this did not happen, especially in the first years after the revolution in 1979 and 1980, weapons might have been carried through Nicaraguan territory, weapons that might have the Salvadoran insurgents, as you said, as their final recipient." (P. 31, supra.)

This has been Nicaragua's consistent position both before and during this case and, if I may say so, its lawyers have never acknowledged anything to the contrary.

Now what is the state of the other evidence in the record on this issue?

First, Mr. Chamorro, a leading member of the FDN political directorate during the entire period in question, said that the contras never saw any evidence of the supposed arms flow (Supp. Ann. G, para. 14). Although as shown above, the strategy and targets of the contras were wholly inconsistent with an arms interdiction mission, it is surely astonishing that in the entire four-year period, that the contra bands were roaming over large areas of Nicaragua and strategically positioned near the major arms routes, they made not a single interception of arms transported by land, sea or air. That could hardly be the case if there were indeed a sustained or substantial arms traffic, and there are reports in the record of independent investigations by journalists showing an absence of intercept by Salvadoran Government forces.

But the record contains direct evidence offered by Nicaragua, through the witness David MacMichael. Nicaragua believes that Mr. MacMichael is a credible witness — that is why it called him. He is eminently qualified to offer evidence on this subject. By background and experience, he is an expert on the very question that is the subject of the United States assertions: arms supply to guerrilla forces in the field.

He was an employee of the United States CIA during the most crucial period here in issue, 6 March 1981 to 3 April 1983. His position as Senior Estimates Officer, a member of the Analytic Group of the National Intelligence Council, put him near the very top of the process for analysing and evaluating intelligence within the United States Government. His official duties required him to monitor all intelligence traffic dealing with arms shipments between Nicaragua and El Salvador during that period. He had unlimited access to all intelligence information on that subject — including raw reports and data from the field, finished intelligence analyses and personal consultation with agents and colleagues. He was never denied access to any intelligence materials he asked to see (p. 52, supra).

His unequivocal testimony is that during this crucial period — from March 1981, more than eight months before President Reagan first approved the covert action programme, until he left the agency in April 1983 — there was no credible evidence of any shipment of arms by the Government of Nicaragua to the rebels in El Salvador. Let me review the examination on this point. I questioned Mr. MacMichael:

> "Q.: All right. I want to direct your attention now to the period of your employment with the Agency; was there any credible evidence that during that period, March 1981 to April 1983, the Government of Nicaragua was sending arms to rebels in El Salvador?
> Q.: Was there any substantial evidence that during this period arms were sent from or across Nicaraguan territory to rebels in El Salvador with the approval, authorization, condonation or ratification of the Nicaraguan Government?
> Q.: Was there any substantial evidence that during the same period, any significant shipments of arms were sent with the advance knowledge of the Government of Nicaragua from or across its territory to rebels in El Salvador?

This testimony was not shaken despite vigorous questioning from the Court. Indeed, in the course of his response to these questions, Mr. MacMichael was able to demonstrate how flimsy some of the so-called evidence published by the United States in support of its allegations really was. Two more aspects of Mr. MacMichael's testimony should be adverted to here.

First, on direct examination in answer to questions put by me as counsel for Nicaragua, Mr. MacMichael testified that he did see evidence of arms traffic in the period of the so-called final offensive of the FMLN at the end of 1980 and the very beginning of 1981. He noted that at that time arms shipments were going to the Salvadoran rebels from other countries in the region, such as Costa Rica and Panama. When I asked him: "Does the evidence establish that the Government of Nicaragua was involved during this period?" he answered: "No, it does not establish it, but I could not rule it out." (P. 55, supra.)

When questioned by Judge Schwebel, Mr. MacMichael stated it as his opinion that the Government of Nicaragua was implicated in such traffic, a point which the Government of Nicaragua denies. But on both direct examination and in response to questions from the Bench, he maintained — and this is the critical point — that the evidence tending to show that there was arms traffic stopped abruptly after the end of the January 1981 "final offensive", well before the beginning of the United States military and paramilitary programme. And it has never resumed throughout the subsequent four-and-a-half years (ibid.). (See also

Second, Mr. MacMichael also reviewed for the Court the multitude of sophisticated intelligence sources and methods that the United States brought to bear on Nicaragua during this period. He said that the capabilities were very high indeed and that Nicaragua was a high priority intelligence target (p. 55, supra).

In view of these capabilities and priority, he stated that if arms in significant quantities were being sent from Nicaraguan territory to the rebels in El Salvador — with or without the Government's knowledge or consent — these shipments could not have been accomplished without detection by United States intelligence capabilities (ibid.).

The witness found the evidence adduced publicly by the United States to be "scanty". "Much of it", he continued, "is unreliable, some of it is suspect and I believe it has been presented in a deliberately misleading fashion on many occasions" (p. 56, supra). And in support of this characterization he pointed out that, despite the vast array of sophisticated intelligence devices available, what evidence has been presented consists in large part of newspaper stories (some of which may have been planted by the CIA in the foreign press), and statements of defectors, made after prolonged detention and interrogation by Salvadoran security forces.

Mr. MacMichael was present when the first covert action plan was discussed in the CIA in the Fall of 1981. He said that he became disturbed from the outset because, although arms interdiction was the "stated purpose" of the plan, no evidence was presented to show that such arms traffic was then in progress. Indeed, the CIA had not made and never did make the detailed and comprehensive investigation of the sources and routes of arms supply to the FMLN that good professional practice would have required (pp. 50-51, supra). As a result, Mr. MacMichael testified that from the outset the "stated purpose" of arms interdiction was "built into" this plan as a "plausible denial" and "to convince the intelligence committees of the United States Congress to authorize the plan" since "such purposes as provoking hostilities between Nicaragua and any of its neighbours, or the destabilization of the Nicaraguan Government through this programme were prohibited purposes" (p. 51, supra).

At the end of his testimony, he reiterated his view: I asked him: "Q.: Will you state again your overall conclusion as to the existence of arms traffic from Nicaragua to the Salvadoran insurgents?" he answered: "A.: I do not believe that such a traffic goes on now or has gone on for the past four years at least . . ." (P. 58, supra.)

It is a lawyer's cliché that it is "impossible to prove a negative". But Mr. MacMichael's testimony, I think, has done so in this case.

Mr. President, Members of the Court, may I conclude by reading from the Court's Judgment in the United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran case, in which the United States was in the position that Nicaragua is in today. I will make minor adjustments to take account of the difference in the parties.

> "The essential facts of the present case are, for the most part, matters of public knowledge which have received extensive coverage in the world press and in radio and television broadcasts from (the United States) and other countries . . . Annexed or appended to the Memorial are numerous extracts of statements made by (Nicaragua) and United States officials either at press conferences or on radio or television . . . In addition, after the filing of the Memorial, and by leave of the Court, a large quantity of further documents of a similar kind to those already presented were submitted by (Nicaragua) for the purpose of bringing up to date the Court's information regarding the situation . . .

The result is that the Court has available to it a massive body of information from various sources concerning the facts and circumstances of the present case, including numerous official statements of both (Nicaragua) and United States authorities . . . The information available, however, is wholly consistent and concordant as to the main facts and circumstances of the case."

"The main facts and circumstances" that emerge from the "consistent and concordant" body of evidence in this record is that the Government of the United States is guilty of conducting unlawful military and paramilitary activities in and against Nicaragua.

The Court rose at 1.00 p.m.

TWENTY-THIRD PUBLIC SITTING (19 IX 85, 10 a.m.)

QUESTIONS PUT BY JUDGE SCHWEBEL

The PRESIDENT: I have to announce that, for reasons disclosed to me by Judge Bedjaoui, he will be absent for both the morning and afternoon hearings. Before we proceed further, Judge Schwebel has a couple of questions to ask.

Judge SCHWEBEL: Mr. President, I wish to put some questions about what the actual position of the Government of Nicaragua is, as the evidence before the Court shows it, on the question of whether and, if so, to what extent it has or has not been assisting the insurgency in El Salvador. Possibly Professor Chayes may feel able to respond to my questions directly from his testimony, or the Agent may wish to respond when he speaks. In any event, it may be helpful to the Agent to know the problem I see so that he may endeavour to deal with it if he deems it appropriate.

For the reasons I spoke of at the outset of my questioning of Mr. MacMichael, with reference to Article 53 of the Statute, and for the reasons to which Professor Chayes referred in noting the difficulties faced by a State — and I may add, by the Court — when the other party to a case has absented itself, I am sure that the Agent and couunsel of Nicaragua appreciate the importance of clarifying this matter. I might add that I put these questions in pursuance of what I understand to be the intent of Article 53, as its drafters understood it to be. You may have seen the valuable book by our colleague Hugh Thirlway, on the rather contemporaneous subject of Non-appearance before the International Court of Justice. He notes that, while the Report of the Proceedings of the Advisory Committee of Jurists which drafted Article 53 is not extensive, the American member of that Committee, Elihu Root, was accompanied, in an advisory capacity, by James Brown Scott, Secretary of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, who wrote a report for the Board of Trustees of the Endowment, which has this to say about the intentions reflected in Article 53:

> "The essential condition for the exercise of jurisdiction in such a case is and must be, that the plaintiff, although proceeding ex parte, should present its case as fully as if the defendant were present, and that the Court be especially mindful of the interests of the absent defendant. This does not mean that the Court shall take sides. It does mean, however, that the Court, without espousing the cause of the defendant, shall, nevertheless, act as its counsel. There is an apt French phrase to the effect that 'the absent are always wrong'. The Court must go on the assumption that the absent party is right, not wrong until the plaintiff has proven him to be wrong." (At p. 25.)

Now on the question of whether and to what extent the Nicaraguan Government is or has been rendering assistance to the insurgency in El Salvador, I find myself in a state of perplexity, not least because the evidence introduced by Nicaragua in my view is contradictory, or possibly contradictory. Let me review salient elements of the evidence as I understand it to be, and then put some questions.

First, there is the sworn affidavit of the Foreign Minister of Nicaragua, which, as Professor Chayes recalled yesterday, categorically stated:

> "In truth, my Government is not engaged, and has not been engaged, in the provision of arms or other supplies to either of the factions engaged in the civil war in El Salvador."

The Foreign Minister's affidavit goes on to acknowledge that there have been clandestine arms shipments from or through Nicaragua apparently destined for El Salvador, but maintained that "on numerous occasions" the security forces of his Government have intercepted such shipments. And he notes that it is difficult to prevent the use of Nicaraguan territory for such smuggling because of the remoteness of Nicaragua's border areas, which are mountainous and characterized by dense jungles.

The next item of interest is a report of an interview by a correspondent of the New York Times with President Daniel Ortega Saavedra, in which the President of Nicaragua, as reported in the New York Times of 18 July 1985, page 10, is stated to have conceded that Nicaraguan territory had once been used to ship weapons to guerrillas in El Salvador. He is further reported to have said that members of the Nicaraguan armed forces had aided such shipments but they had done so without Government sanction.

The next item of interest is also found in the New York Times, where, in the issue of 8 September 1985, Professor Chayes and Mr. Reichler are reported to have said:

> "that they would acknowledge that the Managua Government supplied weapons to Salvador Guerrillas for the big January 1981 offensive against the United States-backed Government in El Salvador. But they will argue that there is no credible evidence of sustained arms shipments since then."

That is one point in the story. Then, after some paragraphs on other matters, the story concludes with another pertinent point: "Mr. Reichler said that he 'strongly advised' Nicaragua that it should not undertake the court suit if it were still involved in arms traffic in El Salvador. 'They assured us from the beginning that they had nothing to hide.' " Now my understanding is that Professor Chayes rather generally and smilingly adverted to this story in his argument yesterday, if I understood him correctly.

Thereafter, on 13 September, Commander Carrión, as witness for Nicaragua, affirmed that,

> "My Government has never had a policy of sending arms to opposition forces in Central America. That does not mean that this did not happen, especially in the first years after the revolution in 1979 and 1980 . . . But this was never an official policy . . ." (P. 31, supra.)

Then on 14 September a story appeared in the New York Times which contains the following passages:

> "American lawyers for the Nicaraguan Government, whose suit now being heard in The Hague charges aggression by the United States because of its support for Nicaraguan rebels, have acknowledged that weapons were shipped to El Salvador before the January 1981 guerrilla offensive there but say there is no 'credible evidence' of a sustained flow since April 1981. They > also say there is no proof that the Nicaraguan Government itself was responsible for the arms that were shipped in late 1980 and early 1981."

I might interpellate that, when I referred in my questioning of Mr. MacMichael to the statements attributed to Nicaraguan counsel in the New York Times story of 8 September, I had not yet seen the story which appeared on 14 September, which I have just now quoted.

On 16 September, Nicaragua presented Mr. MacMichael as a witness. Mr. MacMichael declared, on the basis of his study of the pertinent CIA files and his familiarity with the subject-matter, that he would "rule in" Nicaragua's having supplied arms to the insurgents in El Salvador in 1980 and 1981, particularly in connection with their big January 1981 offensive. He reiterated that conclusion unequivocally in a later point in his testimony, stating that it was his opinion that it could be taken as a fact that at least in 1980/early 1981 the Nicaraguan Government was involved in the supply of arms to the Salvadoran insurgency (pp. 59-65, supra).

On 17 September 1985, there appeared in the New York Times a story which contained the following passages:

> "In an interview with the New York Times earlier this year, President Daniel Ortega Saavedra of Nicaragua said, 'There were times when we were finding groups of 40 to 50 of our army soldiers ready with knapsacks and weapons on their way to El Salvador,' but, he said, 'we have had to detain them and to punish them.'
> Mr. Ortega said that at one point the first United States Ambassador to the Sandinista Government, Lawrence Pezzullo, presented him with evidence that an airstrip in the western province of Léon was being used to transport arms to Salvadoran rebels. He said, 'We took necessary measures so this airstrip would not continue to be used for this type of activities.'"

It is not altogether clear whether this story refers to the interview which President Ortega granted in July to a New York Times correspondent, or to another interview, but it appears to refer to the July interview, and contains quotations from it.

That, I believe, is the record as it stands, to which must be added the statements made in Court yesterday by Professor Chayes. In that latter regard, there is just one more item worth mentioning. Professor Chayes referred the Court to Nicaraguan Annex F, item 191, at page 292, as an accurate description of the involvement of a CIA official with contra operations. I might observe that the very story in the Wall Street Journal, which is item 191 of Annex F, states, in appraising the gains and losses of the contra programme: "It has also reduced the flow of arms into El Salvador". That is a statement introduced into evidence by Nicaragua.

Now on the basis of this record, I wish to ask the Agent and counsel of Nicaragua these questions, and I think it might be helpful if I read all of my questions and then if you wish to respond to any at this juncture I can restate them, and if you wish to put them all over to the comprehensive reply of the Agent, they can be dealt with at once; of course, I will give you a copy of this text.

My first question is this:

1. Does the Government of Nicaragua ask the Court to give full faith and credit to, or in any measure to disregard, Mr. MacMichael's testimony?

2. In particular, does it ask the Court to believe or disbelieve Mr. MacMichael's opinion that it could be taken as a fact that at least in 1980/early 1981 the Nicaraguan Government was involved in the supply of arms to the Salvador insurgency? If the Court is asked to disbelieve this conclusion of Mr. MacMichael, why should it be asked to believe his other conclusions?

3. The story in the New York Times of 17 September contains direct quotations of an interview with President Ortega bearing on the immediate question at issue. Apparently a tape recording or transcript of the interview was made. May I ask Nicaragua to supply the Court with a copy of that transcript or tape recording?

4. May I ask if the Agent and counsel of Nicaragua find that the story of 14 September in the New York Times is an accurate report of their views, or at any rate of the views of Nicaragua's counsel, possibly in contrast to the story of 8 September? There are differences between the two, that is clear.

5. I observe that counsel are reported in the 14 September report in the New York Times not as saying that the Nicaraguan Government was not responsible for shipment of arms to El Salvador in 1980 and 1981, but that there is "no proof" that it was responsible. Is that an accurate report?

6. For this question I would like to return to the quotation of President Ortega's remarks, as recounted in the New York Times. Let me just recall it:

> "Mr. Ortega said that at one point, the first United States Ambassador to the Sandinista Government, Lawrence Pezzullo, presented him with evidence that an airstrip in the western province of Léon was being used to transport arms to Salvadoran rebels. He said, 'We took necessary measures so this airstrip would not continue to be used for this type of activities.'"

May I recall the exchange between Mr. MacMichael and me on this very point, the airstrip being named Papalonal.

> "Q.: Have you heard of an airfield in Nicaragua at Papalonal, or an airstrip?
> A.: Yes, I have.
> Q.: Are you aware of the fact that the United States Government under the Carter Administration made representations to the Nicaraguan Government about the use of that airfield as a principal staging area for the airlift of arms to insurgents in El Salvador?

And Mr. MacMichael continues:

> "I spoke earlier under direct questioning from Professor Chayes regarding information that had existed for that period — late 1980 to very early 1981 — and when I mentioned defectors I had in mind as a matter of fact some persons . . . who stated under interrogation following their departure from Nicaragua that they had assisted in the operations out of Papalonal in late 1980 and very early 1981, and as I say, I am aware of this; there was also an interception of an aircraft that had departed there — that had crashed or was unable to take off again from El Salvador where it landed — and I think that was in either very early January or late December 1980 and this was the type of evidence to which I referred, which disapppeared afterwards.
> Q.: I understand you to be saying, Mr. MacMichael, that you believe that it could be taken as a fact that at least in late 1980 or early 1981 the Nicaraguan Government was involved in the supply of arms to the Salvadoran insurgency. Is that the conclusion I can draw from your remarks?
> A.: I hate to have it appear that you are drawing this from me like a nail out of a block of wood but, yes, that is my opinion."

Now I have one last quotation, and I apologize for the length of this, which is quite critical to the last question I wish to put.

With precise reference to the same subject-matter of the Papalonal airstrip which Mr. MacMichael addressed in the exchange just quoted, the United States maintains:

> "The principal staging area came to be an airfield at Papalonal. The pattern and speed of construction at Papalonal, which is in an isolated area 23 nautical miles northwest of Managua, lacking adjacent commercial or economic activity, made clear its military function. In late July 1980, this airfield was an agricultural dirt airstrip approximately 800 metres long. By December, photography revealed a lengthened and graded runway with hard dispersal areas, and storage buildings under construction. By January 1981, the strip had been lengthened to 1,200 metres. A turnaround had been added at each end. A dispersal parking area with three hardstands had been constructed at the west end of the runway. Three parking aprons had been cleared, and three hangar or storage buildings, each about 125 metres wide, had been constructed on the aprons.
> On January 2, 1981, a C-47 was observed at Papalonal for the first time. Two C-47's were observed in February. These C-47's and DC-3's . . . were used to ferry larger cargos of arms from Papalonal to areas of guerrilla infiltration in southeastern El Salvador. Several pilots were identified in Nicaragua who regularly flew the route into El Salvador. Radar tracking also indicated flights from Papalonal to southeastern El Salvador.
> On January 24, 1981, a C-47 dropped arms by parachute in the vicinity of a small strip in southeastern El Salvador. On January 24, 1981, a Cessna from Nicaragua crashed upon takeoff after unloading passengers at an airfield in El Salvador close to where the C-47 airdrop occurred. A second plane, a Piper Aztec, sent to recover the downed crew, was strafed on the ground by the Salvadoran Air Force. The pilot and numerous weapons were captured. The pilot stated he was an employee of the Nicaraguan National Airlines (LANICA) and that the flight originated from Sandino International Airport in Managua." (Department of State, "Revolution Beyond our Borders", Sandinista Intervention in Central America, September 1985, pp. 18-19.)

The correspondence between these allegations and Mr. MacMichael's testimony is, in my view, significant.

The foregoing quotation is supported by the text of an intelligence summary written for the Carter White House on 9 January 1981, the day before the Salvadoran insurgents' "final offensive" was launched. I shall not take the time of the Court to read that text, but I believe that the Court will wish to read it. It is reprinted on pages 28 and 29 of the same publication, with a photograph of the airstrip.

7. Now my last questions, in the light of all this, for the Agent of Nicaragua are these: in view of the fact that the airstrip at Papalonal is not situated in the inaccessible border mountains or jungle of Nicaragua, but is a rather short distance from Managua; in view of the fact or allegation that, over a period of months preceding the January 1981 offensive of the Salvador insurgents, that airstrip was upgraded from an agricultural dirt airstrip of 800 metres to a lengthened and graded runway with hard dispersal areas, storage buildings, turnarounds, hardstands, parking aprons and three hangars, can the Court be asked to believe that, when the President of Nicaragua stated: "We took the necessary measures so this airstrip would not continue to be used for this type of activities", it was not, or had not been, the official policy of the Government of Nicaragua to use this airstrip for precisely those activities, namely, the shipment of arms to Salvadoran guerrillas? Or, on the contrary, do the foregoing facts or allegations and President Ortega's statement indicate that the official policy of Nicaragua was precisely what Mr. MacMichael conceded it to be in 1980 and early 1981: to send arms to the insurgents in El Salvador? Finally, since the purpose of the insurgents in El Salvador clearly was to overthrow the Government of El Salvador, was not such a policy of Nicaragua, if it existed, directed towards the same end?

Mr. ARGÜELLO GÓMEZ: Mr. President, Members of the Court. I think Judge Schwebel offered to give us the question.

The PRESIDENT: You will also have the verbatim records of this morning's hearings — the entire question as as it has been framed by Judge Schwebel, and because it is a long question, and there are several sub-questions, I suggest that if you so desire you could give a reply in writing later.

Mr. ARGÜELLO GÓMEZ: Yes, Mr. President, that was my intention because we have to analyse what are the legal questions contained here in order to formulate a legal analysis. At this point, I wanted to give again our views on the meaning of Article 53; Judge Schwebel has expressed his opinion on the significance of that Article; also on the significance of some of the evidence. The position of Nicaragua and of any objective reasoning in this case is that it is of no relevance to discuss happenings five years ago when the evidence itself proves that in the past absolutely no question has been formulated as to the continuation of that situation; the development of that situation is, in the view of Article 53, what we are doing in this Court at this moment.

Without going into specifics of the questions, I think it is necessary to repeat what President Ortega has pointed out; what our Minister of Foreign Affairs has pointed out; what Commandant Carrión has pointed out; and, what Minister Huper has pointed out: that is, that it has not been the policy of the Nicaraguan Government to support insurgencies anywhere. The statements contained and read are very clear indicating the preoccupation of the Nicaraguan authorities when they were informed of certain happenings, and the action that was taken to suppress it immediately. Now with that statement, I will take advantage of your offer, Mr. President, and analyse the questions and probably in my Agent's speech tommorrow will answer them.

Professor BROWNLIE: Mr. President, Members of the Court. May it please the Court. Mr. President, in following the speeches of Professor Chayes and Mr. Reichler, it is my task to seek to assist the Court in its appreciation of particular aspects of the evidence. I have sat listening to the factual account presented by my colleagues and I may say that that history is no less depressing than it was when I first became involved as counsel at the outset of this case early last year. Indeed, the revelations which followed the mining of Nicaragua's harbours, together with an increasingly bold public expression of the policy aims of the Respondent State, have introduced new elements of dictation and arrogance.

It is always a privilege to be involved with the practical business of settling disputes by peaceful means and to be given the role of counsel before this Court. On this occasion, it is a privilege also to work with an Agent who has faced great responsibility and pressures with fortitude and dignity and also to work with my American colleagues who represent the tradition of the Rule of Law in their country.

Such an occasion is normally also a pleasant one, but I regret to say that I do not find that my role on this occasion gives me any pleasure. I would prefer that the circumstances which gave rise to my presence here had never arisen.

The spectacle of a small State subjected in the most cynical way to coercion and physical attack by a superpower over a period of some four to five years is grim. Nicaragua has had no choice but to seek all available means to protect herself within the law. The Contadora process, the complaint to the Security Council, and the present proceedings, are all part of an effort to take all measures available.

From the period late in 1983 and early in 1984, when the pressure was being sharply increased, Nicaragua took her decision to initiate these proceedings. This period, it may be recalled, included the invasion of Grenada, a series of sabotage attacks, and the mining of Nicaragua's harbours. It goes without saying that the justiciability of these proceedings is not in question and probably never was, given the voting on admissibility in the first phase of the proceedings. And yet it is obvious that the scale of the case is unusual and that a case of this type presents the Court with a task quite unlike that in delimitation cases based upon special agreements.

No doubt the proceedings would have had a more convenient aspect if they had been restricted by the Applicant State to a complaint based exclusively upon either the breaches of the FCN Treaty, or the mining of harbours, or the attack on Corinto, or some combination of these sources of wrong-doing. But would such a course have been either realistic or morally acceptable? Mr. President, to expect such constraints in this case would be rather like advising a man with many serious wounds, and faced with threats of worse to come, to sue only for hurt to feelings or for only one of his wounds. Difficult though this case may be, it has a structure and reality dictated by its particular factual background, and by the nature of the evidence, which has a quality, a pattern and a coherence, which cannot be denied.

It is the nature of the evidence which is all-important, and this presents some technical issues of evaluation to which I shall now turn.

THE PRINCIPLES OF EVIDENCE IN INTERNATIONAL LAW

The precise issues of evaluating the evidence in this case must be prefaced by some observations about the role of the principles of evidence in international law. The Court will be relieved to hear that my purpose is not to produce a lecture on the law of evidence, but to point to certain questions of technique, policy and general approach, with the aim of providing assistance to the Court in its task.

It is sometimes said that "there are no rules of evidence in international law" (cp. O'Connell, International Law, 2nd ed., Vol. III, p. 1096), and it is normal for standard textbooks and works of reference, such as Whiteman's Digest, to ignore the subject of the law of evidence more or less completely. However, the proposition that there are no rules of evidence in international law is only true in the narrow sense that international law does not appear to give prominence to formal rules of exclusion — or admissibility — of evidence in the way in which common law systems do. And in any case the literature of public international law is not lacking in studies of the problems of evidence and proof, and such studies include works by two Members of the present Court. (Feller, The Mexican Claims Commissions, 1923-1934, New York, 1935, pp. 251-283; Witenberg, Recueil des cours, Vol. 56 (1936-II), pp. 5-102; Sandifer, Evidence Before International Tribunals, 1939, revised edition, Charlottesville, 1975; Rousseau, Principes généraux de droit international public, Vol. I, Paris, 1944, p. 912; Lalive, Jean-Flavien, Annuaire Suisse, Vol. 7 (1950), pp. 77-103; Fitzmaurice, British Year Book, Vol. 29 (1952), pp. 57-60; Cheng, General Principles of Law, London, 1953, pp. 302-335; Evensen, Nordisk Tidsskrift, Vol. 25 (1955), pp. 44-59; Simpson and Fox, International Arbitration, London, 1959, pp. 192-213; Rosenne, The Law and Practice of the International Court of Justice, 1965, Vol. II, pp. 580-584; Lachs, contribution to the volume La preuve en droit (ed. Perelman and Foriers), Travaux du Centre national de recherches de logique, Brussels, 1981, pp. 109-122.)

For present purposes it is necessary to draw attention to the key principles which govern the admissibility and evaluation of evidence in this Court. The first such principle is that it is the Court which has the preponderant role in assessing evidence, and in seeking to establish the objective truth (see Evensen, op. cit., pp. 44-46; Lachs, op. cit., pp. 113-114). However, this principle is of considerable generality and its significance probably lies in the negative indication it gives that the Rules of Court are not based upon the "adversarial procedure" of the common law. The second key principle consists of the complete freedom of action and of appreciation which international tribunals, including this Court, enjoy in respect of matters of evidence (see Evensen, op. cit., pp. 45-46; Lachs, op. cit., p. 111). This principle calls, in my estimation, for careful commentary. It is apparently intended to express the idea that the Court is not bound by a set of rules of admissibility (or exclusion) of the type met with in systems of common law, and thus the Court is primarily concerned with the relevance and weight of evidence and tends to leave aside the issue of admissibility (or exclusion) as such (see Rosenne, op. cit., p. 584). All this is no doubt true, but in terms of practical application the principle of judicial freedom in the matter of evidence is heavily qualified by the necessity, which the judicial function forces upon the Court, of selecting reliable evidence and discriminating against weak evidence, either by open rejection or as a consequence of giving very little weight to evidence not actually rejected.

This qualification of the principle of judicial freedom can be expressed in the form of the third of the key principles which, in my submission, govern the evaluation of evidence before international tribunals. The third principle is, quite simply, to the effect that ordinary principles of logic and good sense must govern the evaluation of evidence since, if the Court is to satisfy itself that "the claim is well-founded in fact and in law", as required by the terms of Article 53 of the Statute, some criteria of logical discrimination and the weighing of evidence must be found. It is only by means of such criteria that the Court can, acting judicially, establish the truth of the facts relevant to its decision with reasonable certainty.

Subject to a certain proviso to be made in due course concerning the standard of proof in the context of Article 53 of the Statute, the Applicant State has taken, and will continue to take, care to assist the Court as far as possible in evidential matters. In this respect the Applicant has placed express reliance upon the pertinent logical categories in presenting evidence and has sought to present the best evidence available.

Express Admissions by Responsible Officials

Mr. President, having concluded my brief general remarks on the rules of evidence, I can now turn to specific aspects of the evidence. The documentary evidence submitted by the Applicant consists to a considerable extent of the express admissions on the part of senior United States officials on the public record. The record also includes evidence of the Administration's approaches to Congress for the funding of military and paramilitary operations in Nicaragua and the resulting committee deliberations and legislation. The Respondent State's policies of coercion have long been matters of public knowledge and that is itself a form of evidence, as appears from the Judgment in the case concerning United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran (United States of America v. Iran) (I.C.J. Reports 1980, p. 9, para. 11). However, two characteristics of the public record are of particular importance evidentially speaking. The first is the probative value of admissions against interest by leading United States officials, and the second is the evidence of a system or consistent pattern of intentions, purposes and acts. These characteristics are important and deserve some emphasis.

In the case of express admissions the probative value derives from the fact that the party makes a declaration adverse to its case. The evidential significance of admissions is increased in the case of a State party when the admission is made by a senior official and the subject-matter lies within his or her personal knowledge and professional competence. An additional criterion of probative value is the expression of official policies and intentions at the highest level of government, and I would refer in this context to the view of the Chamber of the Court in the case concerning Delimitation of the Maritime Boundary in the Gulf of Maine Area (Canada/United States of America) (I.C.J. Reports 1984, pp. 307-308, para. 139). The admissions against interest invoked by the Applicant State in the present proceedings involve the President of the United States, together with other leading officials, such as those occupying the office of Secretary of State, and that of Vice President.

In the precise circumstances of the case there are further elements which considerably enhance the evidential significance of the admissions made by senior officials. The first particular element of enhancement lies in the fact that since 9 April 1984, that is of course the date of the Application, the issue of legal responsibility has been in the open for all to see, it has been sur le tapis. This new phase in the history of relations between the United States and Nicaragua was also heralded by the furore in Congress concerning the revelations of the mining of Nicaragua's harbours (see Memorial, Ann. E, Attachments 9, 10 and 11), the resignation of Senator Moynihan as Vice Chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence (statement of 15 April 1984, Attachment 11), and the receipt of diplomatic protests from a number of States where ships had been damaged by mines (Memorial, IV, p. 125, para. 481).

In simple terms, Mr. President, with effect from 9 April 1984, the admissions were post litem motam and the senior officials concerned could not be heard to say that they did not understand the implications of what they were putting on the record.

The second particular element of enhancement consists of the description over a long period of the actions taken against Nicaragua as "covert actions": as, for example, in the response by the President in his news conference on 19 October 1983 (Memorial, Ann. C, I, 2). In my submission such terminology of covert actions strongly suggests that the activity concerned is not reconcilable with legality.

The third element of enhancement is the fact that a number of statements by senior officials show a consciousness at a certain stage that there are specific issues of legal responsibility which arise from the actions directed against Nicaragua. Two examples will suffice. The first is the speech by Ambassador Kirkpatrick at the conference of the American Society of International Law on 12 April 1984 (Memorial, Ann. C, II, 4). The second is the Counter-Memorial submitted by the United States in the Jurisdiction and Admissibility phase of the present case. Both these items show a clear consciousness of the issue of State responsibility raised by Nicaragua's Application.

I conclude my remarks on the subject of admissions by respectfully reminding the Court that such submissions may have different types of relevance.

First, express admissions provide cogent evidence of United States control over mercenaries carrying out operations in and against Nicaragua.

Second, admissions constitute direct evidence of intention and purpose in relation to United States assistance to and control over forces operating against Nicaragua.

Third, admissions form evidence of the responsibility which the United States bears for the military and paramilitary operations against Nicaragua.

A System or Consistent Pattern of Intentions and Activity

The first characteristic of the public record in this case is thus the incidence, prominence and probative value of express admissions by the leading officials of the United States Government. Marching with this is the second characteristic of the public record, the existence of a system or consistent pattern of intentions and activity visible in the mass of evidence submitted. The consistency of the pattern justifies the inference, the logical conclusion, that the events form part of a coherent and deliberate policy, resulting from decision, planning, specified goals, programme implementation and pre-arranged funding, on the part of the United States Government.

Evidential Significance of the Reference to Collective Self-Defence by the United States in the Previous Proceedings

The express admissions against interest which are a primary feature of the evidence in this case are complemented by the invocations of the legal category of collective self-defence by the United States in the course of the previous proceedings and, in particular, in the Counter-Memorial submitted on the Questions of Jurisdiction and Admissibility (see paras. 6, 202 and 515-519). The details are to be found in Nicaragua's Memorial in the present phase (paras. 191-204), and need not be repeated here.

The present purpose is to point to the way in which one form of evidence is complemented, corroborated and reinforced by another form of evidence. The deliberate invocation of collective self-defence, belated and episodic though this has turned out to be, involved an acceptance of legal responsibility by the United States in respect of the military and paramilitary operations in and against Nicaragua, and this acceptance is a matter of public record and has been expressed in the face of the Court in the incidental proceedings relating to this case. It is clear that the use of the justification of collective self-defence constitutes a major admission of direct and substantial United States involvement in the military and paramilitary operations directed against the Applicant State. The references to collective self-defence imply direct participation in and control of the armed forces involved, rather than indirect assistance in its various forms.

The point of this argument on behalf of Nicaragua stands in need of a certain clarification. Nicaragua disputes that the justification advanced by the United States is applicable on the facts. However, since the United States has decided not to support its assertion by any evidence in these proceedings, the voluntary plea of collective self-defence necessarily connotes a prima facie legal responsibility subject to the validation of the defence by the adduction of sufficient evidence. No evidence is offered by the Respondent State in this Court, and there is a substantial weight of evidence to contradict the hypothesis of collective self-defence.

In particular, the publicly expressed purpose of United States coercion — the overthrow of the lawful Government of Nicaragua — is essentially incompatible with any concept of collective self-defence in a legal form, and the tactics employed, such as the use of terrorism against civilians, are also incompatible with that concept.

Acceptance or Recognition of Responsibility by the United States

Thus far, Mr. President, my argument has relied upon the express admissions of United States officials in two forms.

First, in the form that express admissions against the interest of the party making them constitute a significant part of the evidence supporting the complaints presented in the Application, but are not in themselves conclusive of the issues of responsibility and liability.

Second, in the form that the invocation of the plea of collective self-defence in the incidental proceedings related to the case constitutes a form of estoppel or preclusion, to the effect that the United States bears a prima facie legal responsibility for the military activities in and against Nicaragua, subject only to the validation of the hypothesis of collective self-defence by the introduction of sufficient evidence.

The second form of reliance goes some way, but still not the whole way, to the view that the admissions on the public record, whether in proceedings before the Court or elsewhere, are conclusive on the question which in English is termed "liability", that is to say, the issue of legal responsibility tout court.

In the next phase of my presentation the purpose will be precisely to take the argument the whole way, and thus to assert and justify the proposition that the express declarations of responsible United States officials involve an acceptance or recognition of legal responsibility which, in the circumstances, constitutes an independent basis of legal responsibility, which operates autonomously alongside the causes of action invoked by Nicaragua in the Application and in the Memorial concerning the Merits of the case.

At the risk of stating what is perhaps obvious, I would point out that the three forms of reliance on the express declarations of officials are not interdependent and, therefore, a failure to convince the Court on the more ambitious argument should not, in my submission, prejudice the Court's view of the other two forms of reliance upon express declarations.

Some examples

Before I develop the legal arguments it will be helpful if I give some examples of express declarations which, in any reasonable construction, involve an acceptance or recognition of legal responsibility for a particular course of conduct.

The following five examples provide a sufficient sample of the express declarations of the type in question made by President Reagan.

The first example concerns the attack on the oil storage tanks at Corinto. At his news conference on 19 October 1983 President Reagan is asked a direct question relating to the attack on Corinto which had occurred on 10 October. He was asked whether it was "proper for the CIA to be involved in planning such attacks and supplying equipment for air raids?". The questioner then continued: "and do the American people have a right to be informed about any CIA role?" (Memorial, Ann. C, I, 2).

The President's response was to assert the rightness of the use of covert activity when a country "believes that its interests are best served". There is no denial of involvement, only a refusal to discuss specific cases. Moreover, there is a highly significant reference to "some of the specific operations down there". This was in response to a question which linked the CIA to a specific subject-matter involving the use of force against another State. The reaction is one of essential approval. There is no reference to any legal justification even in general terms. There is no denial of the CIA connection. Above all, the question evokes no surprise, no alarm. President Reagan is clearly possessed of prior knowledge of what he describes as "the specific operations down there".

The next example in my submission is no less impressive. At a White House press conference on 5 May 1983, earlier in the same year, the background to the whole series of declarations was established. The material part of the exchange was as follows:

> "Q.: Mr. President, can I follow up on something you said earlier? Did I understand you to say that if you were forced to stop aid to the Nicaraguan guerrillas, that you would try to funnel through other countries?
> The President: No, I was saying that's what the Committee said, that the Committee said we would have to go overt, and then, in going overt, you can only give money to another government. And, if you did that, then you would have to be depending on — well, maybe those other governments in Central America would give that money to the freedom fighters in Nicaragua.
> Now, if they want to tell us that we can give money and do the same thing we've been doing — money, giving, providing subsistence and so forth to these people directly and making it overt instead of covert — that's all right with me. I just don't want the restrictions put on it that they might put on.
> Q.: You'd be willing to accept the idea of overt aid to the anti-Sandinista guerrillas in Nicaragua?

The President: Yes, but not if they do it as one individual or more than one, as suggested on the Hill — that they would do it and, then, we would have to enforce restrictions on the freedom fighters as to what tactics they could use.

And I have said that if we were to do that, then I would expect that the only fair thing would be that the Nicaraguan Government would itself impose the same restrictions on the freedom fighters in El Salvador, only I don't call them freedom fighters because they've got freedom and they're fighting for something else. They're fighting for a restraint on freedom.

Q.: Can I just . . . All of a sudden now we're aiding freedom fighters. I thought we were just interdicting supplies into . . ." (Memorial, Ann. C, I, 1.)

In his response to this last question the President explained his conception of "freedom fighters".

Mr. President, although it may be a little tiresome and difficult to follow I have produced the entire sequence of questions and answers from the White House transcript.

As Nicaragua has pointed out in its Memorial, the various exchanges between the President and the press on 5 May 1983 involve a series of admissions that the United States was systematically giving aid to mercenaries carrying out operations against the Government of Nicaragua. The element of debate in the exchange is limited to the modalities of such aid. The facts of it happening and its purpose are fully accepted. Moreover, the President accepts that the United States has the means to "enforce restrictions" on the policies and tactics of the guerrillas. And yet "restrictions" can only be "enforced" if the situation is characterized by elements of direction and control.

I move on to the third example which is provided by the interview with the New York Times given in the White House on 28 March 1984. President Reagan recognized there, in the clearest possible language, that the United States was assisting the contras who were, in the phrasing of the question to which the President was responding, "seeking to overthrow a government that we have diplomatic relations with". The President's reply makes no attempt to deny the facts; either the fact of giving assistance to the guerrillas or the fact of having the purpose of overthrowing the Government of Nicaragua. His reply includes the following passage:

"And I see no dichotomy in our supporting the governmment, the democratic government of El Salvador, and the contras here — and we've made it plain to Nicaragua — made it very plain, that this will stop when they keep their promise and restore a democratic rule. And have elections. Now, they've finally been pressured, the pressure's led to them saying they'll have an election. I think they've scheduled it for next November . . ." (Memorial, Ann. C, I. 4.)

The fourth example of such declarations consists of the now famous "say Uncle" statement in a press conference at the White House on 21 February 1985. The full exchange of question and answer needs to be followed through in order to obtain a proper appreciation of the President's thinking. The exchange proceeds as follows:

"Q.: Mr. President, on Capitol Hill — on Capitol Hill the other day, Secretary Shultz suggested that a goal of your policy now is to remove the Sandinista government in Nicaragua. Is that your goal?

The President: Well, remove in the sense of its present structure, in which it is a communist totalitarian State, and it is not a government chosen by the people. So, you wonder sometimes about those who make such claims as to its legitimacy. We believe, just as I said Saturday morning, that we have an obligation to be of help where we can to freedom fighters and lovers of freedom and democracy, from Afghanistan to Nicaragua and wherever there are people of that kind who are striving for that freedom.

And we're going to try to persuade the Congress that we can legitimately go forward and hopefully, go forward on a multi-party basis with the Scoop Jackson plan for trying to bring development and help to all of Central America.

Q.: Well, Sir, when you say remove it in the sense of its present structure, aren't you saying that you advocate the overthrow of the present government of Nicaragua?

The President: Well, what I'm saying is that this present government was an element of the revolution against Somoza. The freedom fighters are other elements of that revolution. And once victory was attained, the Sandinistas did what Castro had done, prior to their time, in Cuba. They ousted and managed to rid themselves of the other elements of the revolution and violated their own promise to the Organization of American States, and as a result of which they had received support from the Organization, that they were — their revolutionary goal was for democracy, free press, free speech, free labor unions, and elections, and so forth, and they have violated that.

And the people that are fighting them, the freedom fighters opposing them, are Nicaraguan people who want the goals of the revolution restored. And we're going to try to help.

Q.: Is the answer yes, Sir? Is the answer yes, then?

The President: To what?

Q.: To the question, aren't you advocating the overthrow of the present government? If . . .

The President: Not if the present . . .

Q.: . . . you substitute another form of what you say was the revolution?

The President: Not if the present government would turn around and say, all right, if they'd say, 'Uncle'. All right, come on back into the revolutionary government and let's straighten this out and institute the goals." (Memorial, Ann. C, I, 14.)

As the Court has heard before, Mr. President, saying "Uncle" is a colloquial expression indicating willingness to submit, the equivalent of saying "pax" in some other cultural contexts. The entire exchange can be summarized in the form of two propositions: first, that the goal of United States policy is to remove the lawful Government of Nicaragua; and second, that this policy is to be enforced by any coercive means available to the present Administration.

Later in the same press conference the President affirmed the position and also asserted, though in very general terms, that what his Administration was doing was within the United Nations and Organization of American State Charters. However, no actual justification was given, and the senior official of the United States must be presumed to know that there is no right to overthrow the government of another State on political grounds.

The fifth and last example of an express declaration is provided by the White House press conference on 4 April of this year. On this occasion, with a considerable fanfare, President Reagan presented what he termed "a peace proposal" which, in itself, constitutes an admission both of United States-controlled contras and the purpose behind the operations of the contras. He said:

> "I'm calling upon both sides to lay down their arms and accept the offer of church-mediated talks on internationally supervised elections and an end to the repression now in place against the Church, the press and individual rights.
> To the Congress, I ask for immediate release of the $14 million already appropriated. While the cease-fire offer is on the table, I pledge these funds will not be used for arms or munitions. The funds will be used for food, clothing, medicine and other support for survival. The Democratic opposition cannot be a partner in negotiations without these basic necessities.
> If the Sandinistas accept this peace offer, I will keep my funding restriction in effect. But peace negotiations must not become a cover for deception and delay. If there is no agreement after 60 days of negotiations, I will lift these restrictions, unless both sides ask me not to." (Memorial, Ann. C, I, 19.)

Mr. President, the so-called "peace proposal" is thus what a lawyer would call a conditional offer, in effect, an ultimatum: agree to fundamental changes in the Government of Nicaragua within 60 days or face a renewed onslaught from the contras. The peace proposal emphasizes that the activities of the United States, in conjunction with the contras, form a single coherent political instrument intended to achieve a set of policy objectives decided upon in Washington.

There are many statements by Administration officials, especially in the period since January of this year, which affirm the goals of United States policy, and the chosen method of implementation in relation to Nicaragua. The documentation is available to the Court. The record includes a statement by Secretary of State Shultz on 19 February, testifying before the House of Representatives Foreign Affairs Committee (Memorial, IV, p. 34), the public address by President Reagan on 1 March (Memorial, Ann. C, I, 15, IV, p. 185), the radio address by the President on 8 June 1985, which is in the supplemental evidence given to the Court when these proceedings were about to begin, and many others.

And the public record includes documents revealing the role of Congress and its committees in relation to the Administration policy of supporting the contras.

This large family of express declarations, together with the legislation which has been submitted to Congress, and the legislation actually adopted by Congress, constitutes an acceptance or recognition of legal responsibility on the part of the United States in respect of the military and paramilitary operations referred to in the Application and the Memorial on the merits.

That, Mr. President, is my submission, and it remains to me to present the argument which provides the legal foundation for that submission.

Acceptance and Recognition: The Legal Argument

In the Corfu Channel, Merits, Judgment, the Court gave considerable attention to what it called the "attitude" of Albania in the context of deciding whether Albania had knowledge of the mining (I.C.J. Reports 1949, pp. 18-20). The Court had no difficulty in establishing what that attitude was by examining the relevant facts. The logic is clear: depending on the legal context, legal consequences will flow from the attitude of a government when evidence can establish the intention or attitude with reasonable certainty. If the attitude of a government, as evidenced by the persistent public pronouncements of responsible officials, amounts to positive approval of an illegal course of action, then the logical consequences must be responsibility for that course of action, and similar reasoning is to be found in the Judgment of the Court in the United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran case (I.C.J. Reports 1980, pp. 33-35, paras. 69-75).

The proposition that acceptance or recognition of responsibility may constitute an autonomous basis of State responsibility has deep and healthy roots in ordinary legal logic, in general principles of law, and in familiar concepts of general international law.

Those deep and healthy roots include the following legal institutions and principles.

The primary principles are, quite simply, those of sovereignty and consent. If a sovereign State commits itself unequivocally to a particular expression of will, then, according to the ordinary principles of logic, an international tribunal has the power to give an appropriate effect to that expression of will. The legal validity of treaties and the principle pacta sunt servanda are the important examples of the effects of sovereignty and consent, but they are not the only examples.

It has long been accepted that a State may create obligations for itself by means of unilateral declarations: the record will contain references to the views of Lord McNair, Law of Treaties, Oxford, 1961, page 11; Rousseau, Droit international public, I, Paris, 1971, pages 416-432; Suy, Les actes juridique unilatéraux, Paris, 1962; Judge Lachs, Syracuse Journal of International Law and Commerce, Volume 10 (1983), page 239 at pages 266-270; Paul De Visscher, Essays in International Law in Honour of Judge Manfred Lachs, The Hague, 1984, pages 459-465 (and see, in particular, the conclusion at p. 465). That unilateral declarations can have substantial legal consequences is evidenced by the Judgments of the Court itself in the Nuclear Test cases (I.C.J. Reports 1974, p. 253 at pp. 267-268, paras. 42-46).

Mr. President, the Court is no doubt well aware that there is no precedent in the decisions of international tribunals for applying the concept of unilateral declarations to a case such as the present. But, for the lawyer, logic can only apply within a particular context and the present case involves the context of State responsibility just as the Nuclear Test cases involved the context of admissibility. The destination in each case may be different although the juridical vehicle remains the same. It is for a tribunal to put legal logic to work in accordance with its judicial discretion and the special circumstances of the case before it.

However, the concept of unilateral declarations is not the only relevant legal institution. There are several others. Thus the significance of admissions in the law is well accepted both in international jurisprudence and in the doctrine. The evidential significance of admissions has been pointed to by Fitzmaurice (British Year Book, Vol. 30 (1953), pp. 44-47); Cheng (General Principles of Law, London, 1953, pp. 141-147); and Martin (L'estoppel en droit international public, Paris, 1979, pp. 194-204); (and see also the Memorial of Israel, Aerial Incident case, I.C.J. Pleadings, pp. 99-100, paras. 89-90). Whilst it is clear that admissions have a contributory and partial effect and are not, evidentially speaking, conclusive, the fact remains that the logic behind the legal force of admissions is identical with the logic behind the legal force of unilateral declarations.

The congenor of unilateral declarations and admissions is the legal concept of recognition. This is normally applied in the context of recognition of States and governments. But it is not so confined either by logic or in actual practice, and thus it may apply to a variety of rights and legal situations. This wide application is generally accepted in the literature: I refer again to the treatise of Rousseau (Droit international public, I, Paris, 1971, p. 426, para. 344); Venturini (Recueil des cours, Vol. 112 (1964-II), pp. 416-419 (with useful citations)); Charles De Visscher (Les effectivités en droit international public, Paris, 1967, pp. 23-24, 101-111); Suy (Les actes juridiques unilatéraux en droit international public, Paris, 1962, pp. 189-214 (see, in particular, at pp. 202-206)). Whilst examples will be in practice exceptional, there is no logical objection to the application of the principle of recognition to the acceptance of legal responsibility for particular courses of conduct; and such acceptance is after all only another case of the recognition of a legal situation. Recognition in this context can be seen to be the natural extension, the more mature version, of the admission against interest.

Unilateral declarations, admissions, and the recognition of legal situations, form the international law branch of a family of legal principles which is well represented in municipal legal systems. The analogues within municipal law include the institution of the waiver of claims, which is the logical complement of the acceptance of liability. In the system based upon the common law there are two further analogues — that is, apart from admissions and confessions of liability. One such analogue is the acknowledgement of a debt which would otherwise be barred by the Limitation Act which excludes the contractual remedy after a certain time has elapsed; see, for example, Anson's Law of Contract, 26th edition by Guest, Oxford, 1984, page 524. Another such analogue in the sphere of public law this time is the principle that the Crown is bound by the law of estoppel by representation: see Hogg, Liability of the Crown in Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom, Melbourne, 1971, pages 146-147.

Mr. President, I know that counsel should not take it on himself to instruct this Court on matters of law but, as it is often said at the Bar, it is occasionally difficult to find authority for fundamental propositions which when stated seem obvious. Hence my essay in legal principles. With your permission, I shall now move from doctrine to practice in the form of the Memorials of Israel and the United States in the Aerial Incident case: I.C.J. Pleadings, Aerial Incident of 27 July 1955.

The Court adjourned from 11.20 to 11.40 a.m.

Mr. President, before the break I had looked at the various matters of principle relating to the concept of the acceptance and recognition of State responsibility as a result of express declarations made by senior officials and I had come to the point where I was going to move from doctrine to practice and there was some practice in the rather interesting form of the Memorials of Israel and the United States in the Aerial Incident case (I.C.J. Pleadings, Aerial Incident of 27 July 1955).

In those proceedings the Memorial of Israel, in which no doubt Shabtai Rosenne had a hand, places careful and — in my submission — justified reliance upon the principle that admissions of responsibility by a respondent State may have "a peremptory and final character" (ibid., p. 99, para. 89). The passages in that Memorial which affirm the principle are a follows:

> "89. Regarding the peremptory and final character of the admissions concerning the state of mind and behaviour of the units of the Bulgarian armed forces, contained in the Bulgarian Notes Verbales of July and August 1955, it is submitted that the position is clear. International law has long recognized the conclusiveness of admissions of this character. The general principle was clearly stated as far back as 1856 in the well-known arbitration in the Croft case between Great Britain and Portugal . . .

> 'If what was contained in the statement of the 17th November, 1851, had been expressed in a note or other diplomatic communication, addressed to the British Government by the Portuguese Government as its view of the case, it might then have been justly said that the one Government had thereby of itself made an acknowledgement and an admission to the other by which the latter was now altogether exonerated from the task of proving that the case really stood as it was represented there.' (British and Foreign State Papers, Vol. 50, 1288 at p. 1291.)

This principle, which is consonant with the general principle of good faith as one of the bases of orderly international intercourse, is now firmly established in international law, and has been applied on many occasions by international tribunals. For decisions of the International Court of Justice in which it was applied, reference may be made to the views of the Court regarding declarations made by the Albanian Delegate in the Security Council in the Corfu Channel case (Merits), I.C.J. Reports 1949, at page 19; to the Court's attitude regarding various official memoranda by the Union of South Africa in the Statute of South West Africa case, I.C.J. Reports 1950, at pages 134-136; and to the Court's attitude towards certain admissions made by France to the United Kingdom in diplomatic correspondence during the 19th century, in the Minquiers and Ecrehos case, I.C.J. Reports 1953, at p. 71.

90. The Government of Israel wishes to stress this point in the light of the tendency which has appeared in the later stages of the diplomatic discussions, and particularly in the meeting of 13 September 1957 . . . for the Bulgarian Government to argue that the Note Verbale of 4 August 1955 (Ann. 17) did not constitute acceptance by it of responsibility, any contrary interpretation being erroneous. In the view of the Government of Israel, in this respect the Note Verbale is clear enough and does not call for any sophisticated 'interpretation'. Acceptance of such a view as the Bulgarian officials have been putting forward would imply that a government would be entitled to blow hot and cold at the same time: for purely political purposes to make statements which, for their impact upon the rights of others, would be of possibly far-reaching implications . . . and then to be free of all legal consequences when those whose rights are affected seek to implement those very rights apparently once recognized."

In the same case the Memorial of the United States (ibid., p. 207) includes a section with the heading "Admissions by the Bulgarian Government to Other Governments", and the first paragraph of this section then reads:

> "The United States Government believes it appropriate to offer as evidence the various communications on the subject of the Bulgarian Government's liability for the killing of passengers of the 4X-AKC aircraft near Petrich on 27 July 1955, made by the Bulgarian Government to other governments whose nationals were on board the airliner and were similarly killed."

This view of the law is confirmed by the third of the "Submissions" with which the United States Memorial concludes (at p. 252). Moreover, that Memorial, in another passage, states:

> "There had been a firm, solemn admission of international liability to the United States Government. The same announced assumption of responsibility was made to all governments concerned, and to the press and public . . ." (Ibid., p. 187, para. 14; and see also at p. 175.)

In sum, Mr. President, this episode in the pleadings before the Court in the Aerial Incident case points up the fact that governments have been quick to recognize the principle of acceptance or recognition of liability when the factual material makes a focus upon this principle entirely natural and inevitable.

APPLICATION OF THE PRINCIPLE OF ACCEPTANCE

The legal argument on the principle of acceptance of responsibility is concluded and it is now necessary to relate the principle to the circumstances of the present case. The facts surrounding the express declarations of responsible United States officials and the terms of those declarations themselves, may be analysed in terms of the following discrete but related elements.

First, the issue of State responsibility has been public and overt at least since the filing of the Application on 9 April 1984, and the existence of the issue was underlined by the proceedings before the Court relating to interim measures of protection, and also to jurisdiction and admissibility.

Second, in the successive statements made by President Reagan and other senior officials, the purpose of the United States Government is evoked with appalling clarity: and that purpose is to use all necessary or convenient measures of coercion to overthrow the lawful Government of Nicaragua and to replace that Government with one acceptable to the United States.

Third, with certain incongruous and untimely exceptions, no legal justification for the policies of the Administration is offered.

Fourth, in so far as officials have on occasion invoked the concept of collective self-defence, that is on its face inapplicable, since ex hypothesi the overthrow of a lawful government cannot be a form of self-defence, collective or otherwise, in any circumstances.

Fifth, and finally, the implication of the various declarations by responsible officials is that responsibility is accepted: it must be presumed that such officials fully appreciate the consequences of their actions or, at the very least, take the risk of those consequences.

This last proposition may be supported by some additional considerations.

In the first place, the declarations form part of a consistent pattern of evidence which confirms the general nature of the attitude and intentions of the Government of the United States concerning Nicaragua.

Second, the fact that the mode of implementing the policy of the Respondent State originally involved "covert action" further justifies the implication that declarations of hostile intention and involvement connote admissions of legal liability, since what is covert is presumed to be impossible to justify in legal terms. In this connection, I would refer the Court to the evidence of Mr. MacMichael on Monday of this week, when he linked covert operations with a policy of "plausible denial" (the phrase he used), as a policy adopted in United States Government practice.

Third, a Government which persistently and publicly declares that it is using, and will continue to use, illegal means to overthrow the lawful government of another State cannot have the benefit of the presumption of innocence or regularity.

Mr. President, I can now leave the general issue of express declarations and the acceptance of responsibility by the United States, and move on to certain forms of evidence which confirm and corroborate the record of acceptance or recognition of responsibility.

Confirmatory or Corroborative Material

The first form of confirmatory evidence consists in the incongruous and substantially inconsistent assertion that United States policies have been justified as a form of collective self-defence. The subject has been fully canvassed in the Memorial (paras. 191-204, 285-291). My purpose now is to underline the episodic and inconsistent character of the reference to collective self-defence by the United States. Prior to the Application presented by Nicaragua in April of last year, the military and paramilitary operations against Nicaragua had been described as covert and, so far as they were reported to the relevant Congressional Committees, they were alleged to involve tactics of interdiction only. The operations actually being undertaken were not justified, firstly, because they were not admitted to exist prior to May 1983, and secondly, because it would have been difficult to provide a credible justification which would, so to speak, stand up in Court. Moreover, when the reality broke the surface of things, as in the attack on Corinto in October 1983, no reference was made by any official to the question of legal justification.

From April 1984 until January of this year, sporadic reference was then made to the concept of collective self-defence, and this belated use of a legal justification goes to emphasize the absence of any serious and consistent attempt to provide a legal justification for the operations before that period. In any case, the mining operation was by definition indiscriminate and literally impossible to fit into a legal concept of self-defence. The same can be said of the terrorist attacks directed against the civilian population within Nicaragua.

However, since the President's press conference on 21 February of this year (Memorial, Ann. C, I, 14), the belated references to a legal justification have ceased. The flirtation with legality, never a serious affair, was now over. In any case, the declarations of responsible officials before the period of flirtation involved an acceptance of liabilty which, together with the other evidence, destroyed the very foundations of the assertion of collective self-defence. The express declarations since February of this year simply confirm that this claim had always lacked substance.

Particular Episodes Constituting Confirmatory Evidence

The Attack on Corinto

The nature, purpose and illegality of United States policy is evidenced in the most concrete form by the attitude of officials in face of particular episodes involving hostile operations against Nicaragua. One such episode was the attack on Corinto on 10 October 1983. This was an attack launched not by mercenary forces, but by personnel forming part of United States units. A speedboat was used armed with machine guns and a cannon. The attack was dramatic and very destructive. More than 100 persons were injured (see Memorial, para. 87). The attack received substantial publicity.

At the press conference on 19 October, a little more than a week later, President Reagan was asked a direct question about CIA involvement in the Corinto affair (Memorial, Ann. C, I, 2). Mr. Reagan's response is hardly that of a Head of State or foreign minister faced with a false and provocative accusation. Not at all. Mr. Reagan was neither shocked nor surprised. No denial is made; and no legal justification is offered. True, he is not willing to discuss details, but the clear implication is that "the specific operations down there" did include the attack on Corinto. The President expressly refers to the responsibilities of a government, and the context is that of a reply to a question which referred directly to the CIA.

As a consequence of the attack, the Deputy Foreign Minister of Nicaragua protested to the United States Ambassador (Ann. F, p. 92), and a protest note was sent to Washington. No denial of United States involvement, either formal or informal, is reported to have been made at any stage, either in Managua or in Washington. Indeed, in the aftermath of the attack, the New York Times reported that "Reagan Administration officials" had stated that the CIA had helped to plan the attack on Corinto, as well as other attacks of the same kind (Memorial, Ann. F, pp. 94-95). Such claims by officials made on the record to the press corroborate the other evidence available on the particular point.

The entire episode confirms the direct involvement of the United States in armed attacks against Nicaraguan targets.

The Mining of Nicaraguan Harbours

I shall now turn to the mining of Nicaragua's harbours under the direction of the CIA in the period from January to April 1984 (see Memorial, paras. 96-98). The mining programme had been approved by the President and formed part of a policy of economic warfare. In April of last year Congress became aware of the programme and there was something of a scandal. The facts were not denied by the Administration: indeed, they were admitted. When questioned on the subject of the mining programme, the President stated: "Those were home-made mines that couldn't sink a ship . . . I think that there was much ado about nothing." (Memorial, Ann. C, I, 6.)

There is no denial that the "nothing" related to activities of the United States. The President simply did not dispute the facts. Nor were the facts disputed in the course of proceedings on Nicaragua's Request for Interim Measures of Protection. Moreover, on 16 April 1984, George Lauder made a public statement on behalf of the CIA (Memorial, Ann. C, II, 5). In this the official made the following express admission:

> "During the 13 January 1981 Senate Select Committee on Intelligence hearing on the nomination of Mr. Casey to be Director, CIA, Mr. Casey said:
> 'I intend to comply fully with the spirit and the letter of the Intelligence Oversight Act. I intend to provide this Committee with the information it believes it needs for oversight purposes.'
> Mr. Casey believes the record will reflect that he and his staff have kept that pledge. A chronology of briefings of the Congressional Oversight Committee in connection with events in Central America reveals that from December 1981 through March 1984, either the director or deputy director briefed the Congressional Committees 30 times on Central America.
> Moreover, from 16 September 1983 through 2 April 1984, other officials of CIA briefed either the committees or the committee staff 22 times on Central American developments. Since the first of this year, the subject of mining of Nicaraguan ports has been discussed with members or staffers of the committees and other members of the Congress 11 times."

The mining of harbours has a special significance since, like the Corinto attack, it provides evidence of a system, a general programme, of hostile operations directed by the United States Government and under its control. Moreover, both episodes produced situations in which the Administration acknowledged its responsibility in unqualified terms, either by failure to deny responsibility when a denial would normally be called for, or as a consequence of express admission.

The Views of Third States

In concluding my remarks about the mining of harbours, I would respectfully remind the Court that third States whose shipping was damaged by mines in Nicaraguan waters made representations to Washington. The States making such representations included the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union (Memorial, para. 481).

My argument concerning the acceptance or recognition of responsibility is now concluded and, with your permission Mr. President, I shall turn to another set of problems which are partly issues of State responsibility and partly related to questions of evidence.

Bases of Responsibility

The evidence in the present proceedings relates to a programme of more or less covert operations including both military and paramilitary action. The operations vary from sudden attacks on coastal targets to special operations across the frontiers — the frontiers with Honduras in particular. The personnel involved are sometimes members of United States special forces, and are sometimes Somocistas specially organized, equipped, funded and controlled by the United States Government. The purpose of this part of my argument is to explore the different bases or models of State responsibility which may be relevant. I am not presently concerned with bases of responsibility in terms of causes of action, which I shall deal with in my second speech in these proceedings, but with the different forms in which responsibility may be attributed to the Respondent State.

My purpose will become clear when I set out the schema of analytical possibilities. The possibilities will relate to the question: what specific relationship does the United States Government bear to the military and paramilitary operations which have been and are being conducted in and against Nicaragua?

First: direct action by means of agencies of the United States such as the Central Intelligence Agency.

Second: action by forces over which the United States Government exercises total or predominant control; that is, cases of agency.

Third: action which takes the form of assistance, in the form of training, supply of weapons, equipment and other matériel, technical advice, or funding; that is, cases of complicity in military or paramilitary operations by forces not falling within the first two categories.

Fourth: action which is not proved to originate with agencies of the United States, or forces controlled by the United States, which action is adopted or approved by the United States Government as an instrument of national policy.

At the outset it may be observed that these categories are not mutually exclusive. Thus, on a given occasion, and for the purposes of a particular operation, an armed band might play a role in any one of the four categories of the schema, given changing patterns of organization and political convenience on the part of the leading actor, that is, the State which takes action in the first three categories, or which adopts or approves the harmful action in the case of the fourth category.

So much for the set of possible relationships. Each analytical possibility can now be examined further.

The first category is that of direct action by the Resondent State, whether this be by means of special units of the armed forces, the Central Intelligence Agency, or a combination of personnel employed by institutions which are agencies of the United States Government. Action within this category would obviously constitute "an act of the State concerned" within the terms of Article 5 of the Draft Articles on State Responsibility adopted by the International Law Commission in 1973 (Yearbook, International Law Commission, 1973, II, p. 165, p. 191). Article 6 of that Draft is also pertinent. If I may remind the Court, this provides:

> "The conduct of an organ of the State shall be considered as an act of that State under international law, whether that organ belongs to the constituent, legislative, executive, judicial or other power, whether its functions are of an international or an internal character and whether it holds a superior or a subordinate position in the organisation of the State." (Ibid., p. 193.)

There is a considerable body of evidence, much of it on the public record, that the intelligence organs of the United States are directly involved in the planning and execution of hostile operations against Nicaragua, including the attack on Corinto and the programme for mining harbours in the period January to April of last year.

However, it is necessary to recognize that there exists a certain "grey area" as between my first and second categories — the two categories first in my schema. It is, in my submission, a matter of public knowledge in this part of the twentieth century, that intelligence and special operations in general use a variety of operating techniques. Agents may be full-time but employed for short or long periods. Some agents are paid retainers and may be called upon in case of need. The realities are fully reflected in Article 7 of the Draft Articles produced by the International Law Commission in the course of 1974 (Yearbook, International Law Commission, 1974, II, p. 276 at p. 277). Thus paragraph 2 of that Article provides as follows:

> "The conduct of an organ of an entity which is not part of the formal structure of the State or of a territorial government entity, but which is empowered by the internal law of that State to exercise elements of the governmental authority, shall also be considered as an act of the State under international law, provided that organ was acting in that capacity in the case in question."

Moreover, the Commission's commentary, which as the Court knows forms part of its report to the General Assembly, explains the provision in the following way:

> "With regard to the formulation of the rule, the Commission felt it preferable to cover in a single article all the cases of conduct of organs of entities which under the internal law of the State have a personality separate from the State but which are empowered by the same law to exercise certain elements of the governmental authority, whether through the application of a normal criterion of decentralisation ratione loci of the exercise of the governmental authority, or in order to meet a more exceptional and more limited need for decentralisation ratione materiae of certain elements of the governmental authority. For this purpose, the term 'entity' has been used in the title of the article as being the most neutral term and the easiest to translate into the various languages, and also as a term wide enough in meaning to cover bodies as different as territorial governmental entities, public corporations, semi-public entities, public agencies of various kinds and even, in special cases, private companies." (Yearbook, International Law Commission, 1974, II, pp. 282-283, para. 19.)

Mr. President, it is clear that, at the end of the day, the touchstone is agency and control by the State concerned and that, in actual experience, what I have called the "grey area" between category one and category two creates a significant overlap between my first category, that of direct action, and my second category, namely, action by forces over which the Respondent State exercises either total or predominant control; that is, cases of agency.

This situation may be covered by the provisions of Article 7, paragraph 2, of the International Law Commission draft, and this especially when the internal law of the State provides an express source of powers. In this connection, I would respectfully draw the attention of the Court to the terms of various United States Statutes set forth in Annex D of the Memorial and, in particular, to section 108 of Attachment 4, which is the text of the Intelligence Authorization Act for Fiscal Year 1984.

The situation of agency and control may also fall within the provisions of Article 8 of the Commission's Draft Articles on State Responsibility. This Article has the heading "Attribution to the State of the conduct of persons acting in fact on behalf of the State", and it provides as follows:

"The conduct of a person or group of persons shall also be considered as an act of the State under international law if

(a) it is established that such person or group of persons was in fact acting on behalf of that State; or

(b) such person or group of persons was in fact exercising elements of the government's authority in the absence of the official authorities and in circumstances which justified the exercise of those elements of authority." (Yearbook, International Law Commission, 1974, II, p. 283.)

Mr. President, the issue is always ultimately that of State responsibility and this is clearly generated whenever there is sufficient evidence of agency or control. It is implicit in the Draft Articles that it is not the formal status of the agent's principal relationship which is the governing principle but the existence of agency and control. The learned Commentary of the Commission attached to Draft Article 8 is of very great relevance: Yearbook, International Law Commission, 1974, II, pages 283-285, paragraphs 2-8. The issue of principle is dealt with in the following passage. In the words of the Commission:

"(2) The hypothesis contemplated in sub-paragraph (a) was intended by the Commission mainly to cover cases in which the organs of the State supplement their own action and that of their subordinates by the action of private persons or groups who act as 'auxiliaries' while remaining outside the official structure of the State. In the same context the Commission wished to deal with the familiar cases in which the organs of the State or of one of the other entities empowered by internal law to exercise elements of the governmental authority prefer, for varied and in any case self-evident reasons, not to undertake certain tasks themselves. They then make use of persons who are not formally part of the State machinery or of the machinery of any of the other entities mentioned; they call upon private individuals or groups of private individuals to take on the duties and tasks in question, although here again these individuals or groups are not thereby formally attached to the structures in question and do not, in other words, thereby become de jure organs of the State or of the other entities mentioned. The Commission, also bearing in mind the important role played by the principle of effectiveness in the international legal order, considered that that order must of necessity take into account, in the cases contemplated, the existence of a real link between the person performing the act and the State machinery rather than the lack of a formal legal nexus between them. The conduct in which the persons or groups in question thus engage in fact on behalf of the State should therefore be regarded under international law as acts of the State: that is to say, as acts which may, in the event, become the source of an international responsibility incumbent on the State."

I would thank the Court for its patience listening to that long excursus. The view of the law expressed by the Commission is well supported by individual judicial decisions and the practice of States (ibid., paras. 3-5). One example of the State practice may be of particular interest, and it concerns the Spanish Civil War. On the Republican side in that conflict a number of organizations and groups of volunteers were involved as combatants, under the control of the Government but not being in formal terms a part of the Republican armed forces. In the opinion of the Swiss Government, the Spanish State was to be held responsible for illegal acts committed by such military organizations, and claims for reparation were accordingly presented to the Spanish Government: see Répertoire Suisse de droit international public, III, pages 1698-1699 (items 8.12 and 8.13).

In the present proceedings the documentary record contains a pattern of evidence which establishes that the forces which carry out military and paramilitary operations in and against Nicaragua are in a relation of agency with the United States and subject to its exclusive direction and control. The record is consistent and the pattern is clearly visible. The planning, logistics, the funding, the choice of strategy, the political objectives, all these are under the direction and control of United States Government agencies. The operations are an instrument of United States national policy and they figure prominently in defence appropriation legislation. The personnel are hired by the United States and form bands of professional mercenaries, acting as agents of the United States Government.

I now come to the third element of my schema of possibilities; that is, action which takes the form of assistance to, or complicity in, military or paramilitary operations and which does not fall within the first two categories. This is, so to speak, the basis of liability which presents the least difficulties of proof. On this hypothesis the relationship of agency and control would not stand in need of proof.

Looking back at the three elements I have presented so far, that is direct action, agency and control, and, lastly, complicity, each would provide an independent and sufficient basis of liability. But that does not exhaust the analysis since the express declarations and admissions by senior United States officials have a considerable impact on the case. Such statements have evidential significance of various kinds and this I have already indicated in my speech. They also lead to the fourth and final element in my schema; that is action which is not proved to originate with agencies of the United States, or forces controlled by the United States, but which is adopted and approved by the United States Government.

As the Memorial (IV, pp. 73-74) has indicated, the highest echelons of the United States Government have repeatedly adopted and approved the acts of the mercenary forces in and against Nicaragua. The relevant evidence has been reviewed elsewhere. In the United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran case the Court was particularly concerned with the second phase of the events when, following the occupation of the Embassy, expressions of approval came "from numerous Iranian authorities, including religious, judicial, executive, police and broadcasting authorities": I.C.J. Reports 1980, page 33. From this evidence the Court drew the following important conclusion. In the words of the Judgment:

> "74. The policy thus announced by the Ayatollah Khomeini, of maintaining the occupation of the Embassy and the detention of its inmates as hostages for the purpose of exerting pressure on the United States Government was complied with by other Iranian authorities and endorsed by them repeatedly in statements made in various contexts. The result of that policy was fundamentally to transform the legal nature of the situation created by the occupation of the Embassy and the detention of its diplomatic and consular staff as hostages. The approval given to these facts by the Ayatollah Khomeini and other organs of the Iranian State, and the decision to perpetuate them, translated continuing occupation of the Embassy and detention of the hostages into acts of that State. The militants, authors of the invasion and jailers of the hostages, had now become agents of the Iranian State for whose acts the State itself was internationally responsible . . ."

The situation involving adoption or approval of a course of action is the last of the four elements in my schema of bases or possible bases of liability which I have presented to the Court.

Whilst I believe this analysis has its own validity, it is subject to qualification and refinement in certain respects.

The first qualification concerns the relation between the analysis and the causes of action, that is to say, the substantive sources of obligation, on which the Applicant State relies.

The point can be illustrated by two examples. A number of the rules relied upon in the Application and the Memorial use the term "use of force", and the Memorial demonstrates that this term includes certain forms of indirect aggression, amongst which is the use of armed bands (IV, pp. 60-65, 69-72). Moreover, there is considerable authority for the view that assistance to groups of insurgents on the territory of another State falls within the concepts of armed attack or armed aggression. Thus, the formation of the relevant rule of law may cut across the four separate categories of my schema, and thus also the concept of the "use of force" may in the circumstances relate to each and every one of the four bases of liability.

A second example may be given. A number of rules relied upon by Nicaragua, both in general international law and in multilateral treaties, prohibit direct or indirect intervention in the internal or external affairs of any State — as, for example, the provisions of Article 18 of the Organization of American States Charter. It is evident that forms of assistance to armed bands operating against a State fall foul of the prohibition against intervention, just as much as the categories of direct action and of agency and control as bases of liability.

In brief, the formation of the rule of substance determines the precise content of the obligation and the standard of conduct. And the important consequence of this is that the difference between the four types of involvement has a much reduced significance.

The Acceptance or Recognition of Responsibility

The second qualification or refinement of my analysis of the bases of liability relates back to my argument that, by its express declarations and admissions, the United States has become liable for the military and paramilitary operations directed against Nicaragua as a result of its acceptance or recognition of responsibility. I refer to that argument once more only for the purpose of pointing out that this independent basis of liability also cuts across the four analytical possibilities, since it recognizes responsibility for the consequences whichever factual hypothesis be applicable.

Moreover, whilst acceptance or recognition of liability is similar to the fourth category — that is, of adoption or approval — it is distinct from it in a critical respect. Acceptance of responsibility is a basis of liability which extends to all four categories, and not only to those factual situations in which responsibility could arise only as a consequence of approval or adoption.

Consequential Issues

Mr. President, in completing this sector of my speech, I would like to refer the Court to a consequential issue. The analytical schema distinguishes responsibility in four situations: first, direct action by the Respondent State; second, action by forces which are controlled by, and thus are agents of, the Respondent State; third, the cases of complicity; and fourth, action not falling within the other categories which is adopted or approved by the Respondent State.

No doubt the damage and loss may be allocated, so to speak, among the four bases of liability. Alternatively, the damage and loss may be related exclusively to a single basis of liability. The question which then arises would be: does the system of allocation or selection of bases of liability affect the issue of quantum of damages?

In my submission, the legal liability should be solidary and, therefore, as a matter of principle, the quantum should not be affected by the selection of, say, agency and control as a basis, as opposed to complicity alone as a basis.

This approach on the basis of solidary responsibility is in accordance with general principles of law and the practice of States before international tribunals.

It is the common practice in national legal systems to allow full recovery of damages in respect of one of several forms of action, providing that these all relate to the same damage. No discrimination is made between different forms of illegality in this respect. The picture may be more complicated in a case in which one form of action is based upon culpa and another upon dolus in relation to the same damage. But that type of situation is no more than of academic interest for present purposes. Moreover, in national systems, most of the problems in practice arise from the distinctions between claims in contract and claims in tort, or between these and the remedies of pure restitution.

In the context of international law, the practice of States in front of international tribunals appears to be based on the assumption that success on the basis of one cause of action will draw in its train full reparation. Thus in the Barcelona Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited case, the Belgian Memorial, in which many jurists had had a hand, presented the facts relied upon in terms of four legal categories. However, the claims for reparation were not apportioned to these heads separately, but to each and all of them. There is no reason to believe that that course was eccentric, and it evoked no criticism from professional opinion.

Indeed, in the circumstances of the present case, the solidary approach, so to call it, is particularly to be commended. The delictual conduct forms a coherent pattern of activity directed to a common illegal purpose, the forcible overthrow of the lawful government of the Applicant State. Moreover, the declarations and admissions which form part of the public record relate comprehensively to the military and paramilitary operations against Nicaragua, which operations have been provided for in United States Statutes during the material period.

The Standard of Proof

That brings my review of the different bases of liability to a final conclusion. My review of the evidential problems in this case has, so to speak, set the scene for my remarks on a question which has been left on one side so far, that is, the standard of proof. The Applicant State has evoked a considerable volume of evidence in support of a case which involves substantial issues of State responsibility. Moreover, the case brought by Nicaragua rests exclusively upon intention or dolus as the basis of responsibility, rather than objective responsibility.

It is well known that charges of exceptional gravity against a sovereign State or its government require to be established by conclusive evidence involving a high degree of certainty. This proposition was adopted by Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice (British Year Book of International Law, Vol. 29 (1952), pp. 57-58), who cited this Court in the Corfu Channel case. In that case, it may be recalled, the Court was reluctant to accept the allegation that a third State had been responsible for the laying of mines in Albanian waters and, in that context, the Court made a general statement as follows: "A charge of such exceptional gravity against a State would require a high degree of certainty that has not been reached here" (I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 17).

That statement of the standard of proof applies, at least in limine, to the present case, of course, but when a principle is applicable, it is to be applied sub modo and taking account of all relevant circumstances. Moreover, the dictum in the Corfu Channel case must be placed carefully within its context. Thus it was related to a charge against a State not involved in the proceedings and this factor must have influenced the insistence upon a fairly rigorous standard of proof. It is also highly significant that in the Corfu Channel case, when approaching the issues as between the parties, which also involved matters of exceptional gravity, the Court appears not to have employed such an exacting standard of proof.

But all this is to some extent beside the point. Mr. President, the standard of proof must depend upon the forensic geography of the particular case. In this case, Nicaragua has sought to assist the Court by presenting the evidence as fully as possible, and it has not relied upon the first paragraph of Article 53 of the Statute. And yet the Applicant State is fully justified in pointing out to the Court the precise nature of the standard of proof in the circumstances of the present case. In my respectful submission the standard of proof is to be determined in the light of three factors which operate together but are also independently valid.

(a) The effect of Article 53

In the first place, the provisions of Article 53 of the Statute dictate a certain liberalism of approach. Thus in the United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran case the Court outlined the position in this way:

> "11. The position taken up by the Iranian Government in regard to the present proceedings brings into operation Article 53 of the Statute, under which the Court is required inter alia to satisfy itself that the claims of the Applicant are well founded in fact. As to this article the Court pointed out in the Corfu Channel case that this requirement is to be understood as applying within certain limits:

> 'While Article 53 thus obliges the Court to consider the submissions of the Party which appears, it does not compel the Court to examine their accuracy in all their details; for this might in certain unopposed cases prove impossible in practice. It is sufficient for the Court to convince itself by such methods as it considers suitable that the submissions are well founded.' (I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 248)." (I.C.J. Reports 1980, p. 3 at p. 9.)

(b) Absence of any denial of the facts

The Government of Nicaragua has pointed out in its Memorial that it does not intend to rely upon the formal procedural possibilities of Article 53, and it is the actual circumstances of the present case which have the formative influence upon the standard of proof. The first such influence is the absence of any denial of the facts by the Respondent State. In the first phase of this case the United States simply refused to enter into the issues of fact raised by the Application, but there was an exception to this in that the United States asserted that the defence of collective self-defence was available on the facts. But in this case no evidence is to be given to support this assertion by the Respondent State. The result of the non-appearance of the Respondent is the absence of any denial of the facts and this outcome is, of course, not the result of the provisions of Article 53, as such, but is an independent element in the case.

The absence of any denial of the facts placed before the Court by the Respondent is an element in the procedure by which the Court decides whether the averments of fact by the Applicant are well founded within the meaning of Article 53 of the Statute, or are otherwise established. The Court took this position in the United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran case (I.C.J. Reports 1980, p. 10, para. 13 (and see also the Fisheries Jurisdiction case (United Kingdom v. Iceland) Merits, I.C.J. Reports 1974, p. 9, para. 16)). Another way of expressing the matter would be to say that the mode of applying the standard of proof must naturally reflect the absence of denial on the part of the Respondent State, and the nature of the facts which are not denied.

(c) Express indication of illegal purpose and responsibility for illegal actions

But it is understood that an absence of denial of itself may not enable the Court to establish whether the submissions of the Applicant are well founded. And yet the absence of denial in this case complements, affirms and reinforces the evidence in general presented by the Applicant. This evidence is, in the words used by the Court in the United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran case "wholly consistent and concordant as to the main facts and circumstances of the case" (I.C.J. Reports 1980, p. 10, para. 13). There is a massive public record which includes a large number of statements by President Reagan and other senior officials of the United States. In these statements the President and his staff give express indications of an illegal purpose and policy, namely, the overthrow by violent means of a lawful government. As I have already sought to demonstrate, these reiterated public assertions constitute an acceptance of legal responsibility for the actions complained of by Nicaragua in these proceedings.

The absence of denial of the facts is not the result of a policy of non-appearance; it is the major complement, the close relation, of the arrogant public assertions of an illegal enterprise by the Chief Executive of the Respondent State and his colleagues. The President's response to a question directly relating to the attack on Corinto at a news conference on 19 October 1983, to which I have already referred, is but one example of positive affirmation of a blatantly unlawful policy (Memorial, Annex C, 1, 2). If I may refresh the Court's memory of this episode. The question put, was:

> "Mr. President, regarding the recent rebel attacks on a Nicaraguan oil depot, is it proper for the CIA to be involved in planning such attacks and supplying equipment for air-raids? And do the American people have a right to be informed about any CIA role?"

The President's reply was:

> "I think covert actions have been a part of government and a part of government's responsibilities for as long as there has been a government. I'm not gong to comment on what, if any, connection such activities might have had with what has been going on, or with some of the specific operations down there.
> But I do believe in the right of a country when it believes that its interests are best served to practice covert activity and then, while your people may have a right to know, you can't let your people know without letting the wrong people know, those that are in opposition to what you're doing."

It is in the nature of the public record in this case which must influence the application of the standard of proof to be applied to the submissions of the Applicant State. The principle that a higher standard of proof is required in cases of exceptional gravity is, so to speak, pre-empted when the existence of a general policy of hostility, and the practice of covert activity, is a matter of public record and is proclaimed as a State policy and programme of action. In other words, the Respondent State has either rendered that particular standard inapplicable by its own acts, or by these acts has substantially removed any element of reasonable doubt. As a matter of ordinary logic, the only issue outstanding is really that of modalities, and with respect to modalities, in my submission, reasonable certainty is the standard of proof appropriate in the circumstances of the present case.

System, Policy and Resulting Breaches of International Law: Evidential Connections

Mr. President, I have now completed my agenda. The last section of my presentation will draw the various threads together, and will indicate the general form and structure of the evidence in these proceedings.

The evidence may be described as consisting of three principal elements:

1. The evidence of armed attacks, the mining of harbours and the recurrent pattern of aggression, terrorism, murder and sabotage, in each case affecting Nicaraguan territory, Nicaraguan waters, Nicaraguan citizens and the Nicaraguan economy.
2. The existence of a system and a pattern of military and paramilitary operations directed against Nicaragua.
3. A series of declarations and admissions by the President of the United States and other senior officials involving unequivocal acceptance or recognition of legal responsibility for the military and paramilitary operations, including the attack on Corinto and the programme for the mining of Nicaraguan harbours, and evincing a general policy of hostility with a specific and manifestly illegal purpose.

With your permission, Mr. President, I would like to remind the Court of the impressive number of elements which constitute a consistent pattern of intentions, purposes and methods of implementation over a long period.

Those elements are as follows:

(1) The sequence and coincidence of the authorization of financing by Congress and the subsequent practical steps taken by way of implementation.
(2) The persistent recruiting and employment of armed forces based on the territory of Honduras and paid and maintained by the United States.
(3) The carrying out of regular attacks by such units against targets on the territory of Nicaragua in accordance with policy directives of the United States.
(4) The continuous funding of such operations by the United States either within the limits set by Congress or at times outside those limits.
(5) The intention on the part of the United States to cause damage to Nicaragua, to exert pressure generally for political ends and, in particular, to bring about the forcible overthrow of the Government of Nicaragua.
(6) The use of particular mechanisms described as covert action involving the Central Intelligence Agency and its operational resources.
(7) Prior to April 1984, the absence of any pretence or assertion of the existence of any legal justification for the activities of the guerrillas acting on behalf of the United Staes.

This consistent pattern of evidence justifies the inference that the events concerned are connected, and are part of a deliberate, concerted and long persistent policy and programme. The system or pattern visible in the record excludes the possibility of an explanation compatible with the innocence of the Respondent State.

The substance and reality of this system or pattern is evidenced in a variety of ways, including the repeated appearance of express authorization of operations by Acts of Congress and the systematic efforts of the Administration to increase the level of funding over a period of four years.

The significance of the pattern, the sharpness of the image, is increased as a consequence of the long series of express admissions by the President and other officials.

Both in the Corfu Channel case (Merits, I.C.J. Reports 1949, pp. 18-20) and the United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran case (I.C.J. Reports 1980, pp. 33-35, paras. 70-75) the Court in its Judgments accorded considerable probative value to the attitude and general policy of the governments concerned as revealed by express public statements and the general course of conduct.

In evaluating the relationship between the general — that is, the evidence of general intention and polices of implementation — and the particular — namely, particular military operations, sabotage raids and other episodes of hostility — the mutuality and logical interconnections of the two are to be fully appreciated. On the one hand, the express declarations of intent and admissions of general involvements in military and paramilitary operations give significance and point to individual episodes of aggression and terrorism within Nicaragua. On the other hand, specific hostile episodes provide reliable proof of the general intention and modus operandi of the authors of such individual episodes.

This evidential link between specific incidents and the proof of a general practice or system of breaches was recognized in the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights in the case of Ireland v. United Kingdom. With your permission, I will read the relevant passage in the judgment:

> "The allegation accepted by the Commission under Article 3 concerned a practice or practices and not individual cases as such. Accordingly, the Court's sole task is to give a ruling on that allegation.
> However, a practice contrary to the Convention can result only from individual violations . . . Hence, it is open to the Court, just as it was to the Commission, to examine, as constituent elements or proof of a possible practice and not on an individual basis, specific cases alleged to have occurred in given places.
> The Court concludes that it has jurisdiction to take cognizance of the contested cases of violation of Article 3 if and to the extent that the applicant Government put them forward as establishing the existence of a practice." (Publications of the European Court of Human Rights, Series A, Vol. 25, p. 63, para. 157.)

In moving to my conclusion I must bring to the Court's attention three factors which should, in my respectful submission, be taken into account in weighing up the evidence, both in determining the existence of a system or pattern and more generally.

The first factor, if I may mention it again, is the absence of any denial of the facts by the Respondent State, by evidence presented in these proceedings.

The second factor is the predominant and long-stated purpose of the operations against Nicaragua, which is the overthrow of the present Government on grounds of a purely political character, namely, the national interest of the United States. There is no evidence that the creation, maintenance and servicing of the base camps in Honduras was related to any genuine motive of collective self-defence. There is no evidence that the Governments of Honduras or El Salvador have requested assistance from the United States for this reason.

Mr. President, I would recall the diplomatic notes sent by the Governments of El Salvador and Honduras to the Registrar of the Court and the Secretary-General, respectively, in April of last year — I refer to the Annexes to the Counter-Memorial submitted by the United States on 17 August 1984 (Nos. 103, 104). These documents make reference to Article 33 of the United Nations Charter but there is no reference to Article 51 of the Charter, or otherwise to the concept of collective self-defence. The omission is surely significant.

And in this same context I would draw the attention of the Court to the report submitted to Congress by Secretary Shultz on 15 March 1984 pursuant to section 109 (f) of the Intelligence Authorization Act of 1984 (United States Counter-Memorial, No. 95). This document was published by the United States Department of State with the title US Efforts to Achieve Peace in Central America.

There is no reference in this fairly substantial report to the taking, or to the necessity of taking, action by way of collective self-defence. It is, of course, notable that this report was published prior to the presentation of Nicaragua's Application on 9 April. However, even when proceedings were envisaged by the United States, and the wind seemed to grow cold, the United States officials still did not have collective self-defence in the forefront of their minds. Indeed, it was not present at all. Thus the departmental statement, which accompanied the famous Shultz letter of 6 April 1984 to the Secretary-General, contains no reference to action by way of collective self-defence and this, Mr. President, is in a context where it would be expected since that statement had an overtly argumentative and political tone. No doubt, the United States did eventually make a temporary attachment to collective self-defence, but this was in the face of litigation, was unrelated to reality, and was self-serving.

The third factor to be taken into account in weighing the evidence is the principle, which is well recognized, that the Applicant State may rely on inferences of fact and circumstantial evidence when, by reason of the exclusive territorial control of the Respondent State — or of third States — the Applicant is unable to furnish direct proof of facts giving rise to responsibility.

This principle was stated and applied by the Court in the Corfu Channel case (Merits, I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 18), and also in its Judgment in the Jurisdiction phase of these proceedings (I.C.J. Reports 1984, p. 437, para. 101). It is also given prominence by authoritative publicists, including O'Connell (International Law, 2nd ed., 1970, II, p. 1098) and Rosenne (The Law and Practice of the International Court, 1965, I, p. 582). The principle has also received the notice and approval of two former Judges of the Court: Sir Gerald Fitzmaurice (British Year Book of International Law, Vol. 29 (1952), p. 59); and Sir Hersch Lauterpacht (The Development of International Law by the International Court, 1958, p. 88).

This principle was also relied upon in the Memorials of the Governments of Israel, the United States and the United Kingdom in the Aerial Incident case (see I.C.J. Pleadings, Aerial Incident of 27 July 1955, pp. 101, 249 and 352-353, respectively).

To conclude on inferences of fact and indirect evidence: such evidence is not to be taken as either a superior form of evidence or an inferior type of evidence. Indeed, the distinction between direct and indirect evidence is usually over-emphasized. And this is especially so when the criteria of State responsibility have to be applied to the processes of government and to the links between covert and special operations in the field and policy-making at the top.

The principles of evidence are essentially principles of logic and common sense, and this was underlined by Judge Badawi Pasha in his dissenting opinion in the Corfu Channel case (Merits, I.C.J. Reports 1949, pp. 59-60). The evidence in each case has an individual texture. It has its own tone and morphology, rather like a language. In the present case the express admissions of responsible officials operate to confirm the truth and reliability of inferences of fact. In consequence, when what may be regarded in isolation as elements of indirect evidence, or inferences of fact, is related to the express admissions, the acceptance of responsibility, which form part of the record, the result is proof of responsibility with reasonable certainty, leaving no room for reasonable doubt.

In short, it is the interlocking of evidence and its weight in the evidential circumstances taken as a whole which counts. The fact that some of the evidence is in some sense indirect or circumstantial does not give any real indication of the value of the evidence available in the particular case. Mr. President, after preparing these observations which may perhaps seem to be common sense, I was not surprised to find the following passage in a leading work of authority on the law of evidence:

> "No useful purpose is served by a comparison of the merits of direct and circumstantial evidence. Although, in legal parlance, circumstantial evidence does not mean a detailed account of what happened (as it formerly did in popular speech), the phrase retains an important element of its original meaning when used by lawyers because circumstantial evidence derives its main force from the fact that it usually consists of a number of items pointing to the same conclusion. The blood on the accused's knife may not be of much significance, but additional facts, such as the accused's animosity towards the deceased, benefits to be derived by the accused from the death of the deceased, and the accused's efforts to conceal the knife may give it a very damning complexion." (Cross on Evidence, 5th ed., London, 1979, p. 11).

SUMMARY OF PRINCIPAL CONCLUSIONS

Mr. President, I have now reached my summary of principal conclusions.

1. The consistent pattern of express admissions of responsibility by the President of the United States and other leading officials forms part of the public record in this case, together with the evidence of the Administration's persistent approaches to Congress for the funding of military and paramilitary operations in and against Nicaragua.

2. Express admissions made on behalf of the United States and which are adverse to its case are relevant to the claim of Nicaragua in three ways:

First, such express admissions provide cogent evidence of United States control over mercenaries carrying out operations against Nicaragua.

Second, such admissions contribute direct evidence of intention and purpose in relation to United States assistance to and control over forces operating against Nicaragua.

Third, such admissions are evidence of the responsibility which the United States bears for the military and paramilitary operations.

3. The express declarations of responsible United States officials involve an acceptance or recognition of legal responsibility which, in the circumstances, contributes an independent basis of legal responsibility in this case.

4. The evidence on the public record of acceptance or recognition of responsibility is confirmed by other evidence, including the sporadic and temporary reliance by United States officials upon the concept of collective self-defence, the official attitude to the news of the attack on Corinto and to the programme of mining, and the determinations of third States when their shipping was damaged as a result of the mining of Nicaraguan harbours.

5. The reference to collective self-defence by officials of the Respondent State cannot provide any basis of legal justification for United States actions since:

First, no evidence is produced in this Court by the Respondent State to support such a defence.

Second, the express declarations of the President and other officials make clear the fact that the real purpose of the military operations directed by the United States is the overthrow of a lawful government, which goal has nothing in common with self-defence.

Third, the tactics of terrorism directed against the civilian population of Nicaragua, like the mining programme, are entirely incompatible with the concept of self-defence.

6. The evidence adduced by the Applicant State amply proves the existence of a system or consistent pattern of intentions and activities on the part of the United States. The consistency of the pattern justifies the inference that the events form part of a coherent and deliberate policy, involving specified goals, pre-arranged funding, and implementation in the form of recurrent military and paramilitary operations.

7. Responsibility for military and paramilitary operations may be incurred in four types of situation:

First, direct action by the Respondent State.

Second, action by forces which are controlled by, and thus are agents of, the Respondent State.

Third, cases of assistance or complicity.

Fourth, action not proved to be within the other categories which is adopted or approved by the Respondent State.

8. There is a significant overlap between the first two categories and, within those two categories, the ultimate test is that of agency and control, and not the formal status of the individuals or forces employed.

9. In any case the significance of the distinction between the four situations is much reduced by other factors, including the manner in which the primary or substantive rules of the law are formulated and the existence of an acceptance or recognition of responsibility on the part of the United States.

Mr. President, I have now concluded. I thank you and your colleagues for your patience.

The Court rose at 1.05 p.m.

TWENTY-FOURTH PUBLIC SITTING (19 IX 85, 3 p.m.)

Professor CHAYES: Mr. President, Members of the Court; may it please the Court.

It is my function today to complete the presentation of Nicaragua's claims under the great international charters that regulate the fundamental relations of States in the world and in the region where both of the Parties to this case are situated. I shall speak briefly, for these matters have been exhaustively treated in the Memorial. I will touch on four main issues.

First, Article 2 (4): the United Nations Charter prohibition on the use of force.

Second, the comparable provisions of the Charter of the Organization of American States.

Third, the multilateral treaty reservation to the United States declaration under Article 36 (2) of the Statute of the Court.

Fourth, the question of self-defence.

It has taken a long time, but we have finally come to the issues of substantive law in this case. We are no longer talking about provisional measures or jurisdiction or points of procedure, important though those are. We have reached the core question that gives this case its historic significance: what is the scope, under Article 2 (4) of the United Nations Charter of the permissible use of force by States in the conduct of their international relations?

I need not tell the Court that this is a favourite topic of publicists, some of whom are also present or former Members of this Court. But this will be the first time that the Court will speak comprehensively and authoritatively on the meaning of Article 2 (4).

The voluminous scholarly writing on the subject is arrayed and fully analysed in Nicaragua's Memorial filed on 30 April 1985. The Court will perhaps be relieved to hear that we have discovered nothing new on the subject since that date. I cannot think that yet another review of the authorities, weighty though they be, will be very helpful to the Court at this stage. Instead, Mr. President and Members of the Court, I ask you to consider Article 2 (4) in its fundamental aspect, for you must give life and meaning to its language and to its aspirations in the circumstances of international life at the beginning of the twentieth century.

It hardly bears repeating here that Article 2 (4) is the keystone of the Charter. It is the language in which a war-weary generation invested much of its hope for the future.

"All Members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations."

It is a commonplace that what the draftsmen of the Charter had in mind in forming Article 2 (4) was old-fashioned transborder aggression, carried out by the uniformed armed services of a State. Statesmen, no less than generals, have a penchant for fighting the last war.

Old-fashioned transborder aggression has not disappeared since 1945. We seem to have had an example in Angola, only the other day. But we know it when we see it, and legal questions about it ordinarily centre around the issues of justification and defence.

It is also common ground that Article 2 (4) was not to be confined to old-fashioned transborder aggression. It had already become apparent in the early years under the Charter that States, particularly great States, had means for imposing their will on others by force, or the threat of force, without sending troops. In an era of spreading independence of former colonies, wars of liberation, unstable and shifting régimes, and ideological struggle, the intellectual battleground among international lawyers has been: how far beyond the notion of transborder aggression does Article 2 (4) go? How much less than actual use of troops is required?

As a starting point for our analysis, I put it to the Court that if the armed actions shown on this record had been carried out by the armed forces of a State, there could be not the slightest hesitation in saying that they constituted a use of force by that State.

But, of course, a significant portion of the acts of the United States, charged by Nicaragua as violating international law were in fact carried out by persons who were, in effect, armed forces of the United States. I speak now of the attacks, beginning in September of 1983 and extending through April of 1984, levied against the oil supply facilities and the ports of Nicaragua.

I read aloud in Court yesterday an extraordinary account of a meeting between Duane Clarridge, a senior officer of the United States Central Intelligence Agency, and some of the Nicaraguan leaders of the covert operation he was responsible for running. He told them that the CIA had decided it was necessary to destroy the oil supply system of Nicaragua. What was the reason? "Because without oil the Nicaraguan military would be immobilized and its capacity to resist our forces would be drastically reduced." (Supp. Ann. G, para. 20). I think the Court will have to look hard to find that a permissible purpose.

Clarridge next reviewed with them the alternatives that the CIA had considered. First there was a plan to sink ships, but "one problem with this plan was that if a ship belonging to the Soviet Union were sunk it could trigger a serious international incident" (ibid.). Then there was a plan to bomb the Managua oil refinery, the only one in Nicaragua. "However, the refinery was located in a densely populated area, and the civilian casualties resulting from such an attack would be politically counterproductive." (Ibid.) So the CIA settled on a plan to destroy the oil pipelines at Puerto Sandino and the other oil facilities on Nicaragua's Pacific coast (ibid.).

Within weeks after this conversation the attacks began. The "troops" — if I may call them that — may have been called by a demeaning epithet: Unilaterally Controlled Latino Assets — but they were in the employ of the United States. They were under the command of United States military and intelligence officers, including direct operational command during the course of the attacks. They were supported by helicopters manned by pilots in the uniformed service of the United States. And the dispatches reporting their actions to headquarters did not fail to report Nicaraguan casualties. (Suppl. Ann. C, para. 21; Ann. C, Attachment III-3; Ann. F, No. 48, p. 89; No. 72, p. 125; No. 98, p. 168; No. 99, p. 169; No. 104, p. 176; No. 188, pp. 284-287.)

These attacks constituted an indisputable use of force in the old-fashioned sense. There can be no question of justification — by way of self-defence or otherwise. It does not take an international legal scholar to see that. Senator Barry Goldwater, Chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, did not mince any words about it. He said: "That is a violation of international law." (Ann. E, Attachment 9.) The Court should not hesitate to say so too.

It appears, however, that these attacks have ceased. The public revelation that they were going on caused a storm of protest in the United States. The result, however, was perhaps not uninfluenced by the proceedings in this Court. Those who ask "how many divisions has the Court?" would do well to consider the chronology: the UCLA attacks and the mining of Nicaraguan waters came to a climax at the very end of March 1984. Nicaragua filed its Application in this case on 9 April (see Ann. F, No. 89, p. 153; No. 90, pp. 154-156; No. 83, p. 145).

But if those attacks have ceased that is not enough. The gravamen of this case is the depradations of the contra army and the effort organized by the United States to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua. It is to get these actions stopped that Nicaragua has come to the International Court of Justice.

The contra attacks go on, however, just as you have heard them described by eye-witnesses before the Court. And, as you also heard, last June they received a new infusion of 27 million dollars of so-called "non-military" United States aid (Supp. Ann. A, IV, pp. 374-376; Supp. Ann. C, Attachment 7). Non-military aid which was followed in a few weeks by renewed contra offensive. Moreover, Nicaragua's claims for compensation cover the consequences of the contra attacks from their beginning in December 1981. So we must return to the earlier question: how far beyond the actual use of a State's own troops or its own employees does the prohibition of Article 2 (4) extend?

In a technical sense this question is treated under the heading of "State responsibility" or "imputability", and I have no quarrel with those analytic categories. But I do not want them to obscure the realities of this case.

I have already suggested in very brief terms the circumstances of current international life that make this problem an important one. In such conditions, irregular or guerrilla warfare is an endemic condition in many countries. And, again, given those circumstances, those fighting within a country will often have ties to persons and even governments outside. The problem has been to distinguish the "use of force" within the meaning of Article 2 (4) from lesser involvement by the outside State. That is not to say that lesser involvement may not also be a breach of that State's duties under international law. But on the present branch of the case we are speaking about use of force, and we must find a means of evaluation that gives proper effect to both of those words.

I want to turn now to some of the efforts that have been made to grapple with that problem. The following passages, which I will simply quote seriatum, are drawn from the writings of publicists and the declarations of various international institutions. You will recognize that they are not intended to be exhaustive. They could hardly be, given the time available for this hearing. And they are not advanced to support any particular set of criteria. They are intended rather to give us a sense of key elements that seem to emerge in any serious treatment of the subject.

Professor Brownlie writes:

> "The use of volunteers under governmental control for launching a military campaign or supporting active rebel groups will undoubtedly constitute a 'use of force'. It is the question of government control and not the label 'volunteer' or otherwise which is important." (I. Brownlie, International Law and the Use of Force by States, pp. 371-372 (1963).)

After an extensive study of the problem of defining aggression, the Secretary-General of the United Nations concluded in 1952:

"The characteristic of indirect aggression appears to be that the aggressor State, without itself committing hostile acts as a State, operates through third parties who are either foreigners or nationals seemingly acting on their own initiative." (Question of Defining Aggression: Report of the Secretary-General, 56 UN doc. A/2211, 30 October 1952.)

Some 20 years later, the United Nations finally adopted a Definition of Aggression. Article 3 specifies certain acts that shall "qualify as aggression", including:

"The sending by or on behalf of a State of armed bands, groups, irregulars or mercenaries, which carry out acts of armed force against another State of such gravity as to amount to the acts listed above, [the acts listed above were bombardment, invasion, and so on] or its substantial involvement therein." (Art. 3 (g) of the United Nations Definition of Aggression, G.A. res. 3314 (XXIX) (1974).)

The International Law Commission has also had many occasions to address this problem:

"(A) definition of aggression should cover not only force used openly by one State against another, but also indirect forms of aggression such as the fomenting of civil strife by one State in another, the arming by a State of organized bands for offensive purposes directed against another State, and the sending of 'volunteers' to engage in hostilities against another State." (Position of the International Law Commission, quoted in Question of Defining Aggression: Report of the Secretary-General, 74 UN doc. A/2211.)

Finally, former President of the Court, Eduardo Jiménez de Aréchaga elaborates the difference between the articles expressly interpreting the Article 2 (4) prohibition of the use of force and those on intervention in the 1970 Declaration of Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Co-operation among States. Mr. President, Judge Jiménez de Aréchaga's article was in Spanish and most of the Members of this Court have already heard me try to speak French: my clients did also and they were not willing to trust me to speak Spanish so they have provided an English translation of the passage from this article, but the Spanish will appear in the transcript. He says:

"To intervene in a civil war it is sufficient to interfere in it, for instance by a premature recognition of belligerency; to violate the prohibition on the use of force it is required to organize, instigate, assist or participate in acts of civil war or in acts of terrorism in another state."

"Para intervenir en una lucha civil es suficiente interferir en ellas, por ejemplo, mediante un reconomiciento prematuro de beligerancia; para violar la prohibicion del uso de la fuerza se requiere organizar, instigar, ayudar o participar en actos de guerra civil o en actos de terrorismo en otro Estado. (Emphasis in the original.)" (E. Jiménez de Aréchaga, El Derecho Internacional Contemporaneo 140 (1980).)

We see that the authorities talk in terms of "direction and control"; "use as an instrument"; "sending" of armed bands into another State by or on behalf of the sending State; "participating in acts of terrorism, fomenting and instigating".

These terms and formulations all have much in common and I will wish to comment on that in a moment. But in any particular case, the ultimate question of liability does not yield to bright line rules. It will resolve itself into one of judgment in which the Court must evaluate the record in the light of these factors and decide whether the Respondent is to be held accountable for the actions of the irregular force, in this case an irregular force which it has created, directed, and sustained in every particular. And let me say immediately that in whatever terms the standard applicable under Article 2 (4) to indirect aggression is expressed, the case made in the record before the Court meets its requirements. The depth and breadth and intensity of the United States involvement with the contras at every juncture is painfully clear. Let me recall the eight broad propositions Mr. Reichler and I addressed yesterday; each established by a mass of details and mutually corroborative evidence. Seven of these speak to comprehensive United States involvement with the contras. (1) The United States created and organized the contra force; (2) armed, equipped and trained it; (3) devised the strategy and tactics; (4) provided combat support for field operations; (5) installed and paid a hand-picked civilian leadership. All this was done on the basis of policies established and carried out at the highest levels of the United States Government and finally was for the purpose of overthrowing the Government of Nicaragua.

Despite the overwhelming character of the case, perhaps because I remain a professor at heart, I would like to make a few — perhaps unsystematic — comments relating those facts to the terms and formulations that have been used in the professional discussion of the use of force under Article 2 (4) and which we have, just a moment ago, reviewed. All these terms have a distinct active element, and properly so, given the type of distinction that is being made between use of force and some lesser degree of involvement. I do not propose these formulations as litmus tests for the use of force; they do not comprise a list of requirements all of which are necessary for liability; they provide an orientation, a sense of the direction in which we must pursue our evaluation.

Direction and control: Professor Brownlie lists the following indicia:

> "(N)umbers, central direction, size of offensive launched, . . . identification of formations and divisions . . . source of equipment, origin of the command under which the forces operate, and an absence of disavowal by the government of the state of origin." ("Volunteers", 5 International Comparative Law Quarterly 574 (1956).)

Nicaragua, as I am sure you will recognize, has presented evidence under each one of these heads, showing that the CIA determined the size, and it was a large size, organization, strategy and tactics of the contra force; supplied all its arms and equipment; and not only the CIA but the President of the United States have openly avowed and supported contra activities. There is no requirement that the irregulars or guerrillas must be tantamount to an organ of the outside State. And the requirement or the indicia of direction and control does not mean that individual members of these forces may not have their own desires and goals. The President asked Commander Carrión whether it was not possible that some of the contras were acting sincerely out of ideological or patriotic motives. Commander Carrión testified that most of them were mercenaries or forcible recruits. But he agreed that some might have held the motives suggested by the President (p. 29, supra); whether they did or not, they still took orders from the CIA.

At some point in every military operation, of course, command authority is delegated to field commanders. Here, it is obvious that, except for the UCLAs, the United States participants were making an effort to avoid crossing the international border or operating on the territory of Nicaragua. There are some exceptions even to this generality: overflights for the purposes of supply drops and reconnaissance were frequent (pp. 16-17, supra; Ann. A, Exhibit A, p. 42).

But in the main the United States participants stayed on "their" side of the line. All this is implicit in the very idea of indirect aggression, which is defined as such by the fact that it does not involve large-scale territorial trespass by the acting State.

Instrumentality: "Direction and control" is closely allied with the concept of using an outside force as an instrument to accomplish the objectives of the controlling State. Evidence of instrumentality focuses on motives and purpose of that State, and on the methods chosen to implement its policy. Here we have both purpose and implementation. In the light of the evidence presented yesterday, there can be no doubt that the contra force is used as an instrument of the purposes of United States foreign policy.

The original plan of December 1981 grew out of an earlier search for ways of asserting United States authority and influence in the Caribbean and Central America, a search that included Secretary of State Haig's suggestion to "go to the source" of the opposition (Ann. F, No. 3, p. 4; No. 188, p. 282). Ultimately, it was decided that Nicaragua was an important pressure point.

Attention then turned to the rag-tag groups of ex-National Guardsmen operating on the northern borders of Nicaragua. As you heard yesterday, they were turned into a fighting force of 3,500 and then 7,000, and now perhaps 10,000 to 11,000 men — an effective military instrument (pp. 14, 18, 29). And that instrument, through the financial, strategic, logistic and operational controls exercised by the United States, was at the service of United States purposes towards Nicaragua. That is why it was created.

We have said, and amply proved, that the purpose animating United States policy was the overthrow of the present Government. That may well have been the purpose of many or even most of those in the contra force. But this was no mere coincidence of purposes — two actors jointly pursuing a common end. The United States called the tune and the contra leaders did what they were told. They became an extension of the Central Intelligence Agency — as Mr. Chamorro said, "the executioner of its orders" — and the CIA, as we have seen, is a fully subordinate arm of United States foreign policy.

Sending by or on behalf of the acting State: Here we look to evidence of external impulse and external imposition of will on the irregular forces. How can we say that the contras were "sent" into Nicaragua? Were they not ready and willing to go on their own? Congressman Wright, the Majority Leader of the House of Representatives, had no trouble with this point. He said: "The CIA actively recruited and trained and equipped thousands of men and sent them into Nicaragua to engage in war." (Supp. Ann. C, Attachment 5, 131 Cong. Rec. H4152 (12 June 1985).) An FDN leader himself commented that what the CIA chief in Honduras did was to get the contra commanders out of their comfortable houses in Tegucigalpa and into the field in Nicaragua (Ann. F, No. 188, p. 285).

The contra army was sent into Nicaragua by the United States in a much more fundamental sense. Its missions in their essential aspects were defined by the United States. Its offensives were planned by the United States. The military objectives were established by the United States. Particular targets were selected by the United States, and the command structure, as described in the testimony, was such that it is clear the CIA gave the orders to march.

Participation in acts of terrorism: It is especially painful for an American to talk about United States responsibility for the acts that have been so vividly described in the testimony. According to Professor Glennon's testimony, high United States officials told him they had knowledge of the contra atrocities, that "the level of atrocities was enormous", and that the United States Government maintained a posture of "intentional ignorance" (p. 77, supra). But this is not an abstract question of whether mere inaction in the face of knowledge is enough for liability. That is what I mean when I say that technical categories should not be allowed to obscure the realities of the case. The record in this case, unfortunately, reveals much more than mere knowledge.

It is a fundamental principle of command responsibility — written into the training manuals of all the United States armed forces, as well, I think, of most of the armed forces of the world — that the commander is affirmatively responsible for instructing his troops in the requirements of the law of war and for imposing discipline when these requirements are violated, even in occasional instances. If not, he is guilty himself, and that responsibility is transmitted to his superiors right up to the chain of command — until someone takes corrective action. Here the CIA was in the position of trainer and commander. It failed on both counts. There is no evidence that the instructors ever provided training in the law of war or ever imposed discipline for violations. On the contrary, in what may be the most shameful episode in this whole sorry affair, the CIA prepared the manual on Psychological Operations in Guerrilla Warfare, distributed 2,000 copies among the contras and conducted seminars to see that its lessons were well learned (Supp. Ann. G, para. 28; p. 17, supra).

Moreover, the CIA, as well as other high American officials, both in the past and today, have tried systematically to disparage the evidence and to conceal from the American people and the world the fact that the contras are engaging in terror tactics. Mr. Chamorro lost his job when he said truthfully, in response to a reporter's question, that atrocities were in fact being committed, although even he tried to explain them away (Supp. Ann. G, para. 29).

I am glad to say that concealment of that kind remains very difficult to achieve in the United States. The truth has been made known by a number of investigations, like that of the International Human Rights Law Group about which Professor Glennon testified. Three such reports are included in Annex I. The conclusions of all of them are substantially similar and are summarized in Supplemental Annex E, a recent report by Americas Watch, an independent non-profit organization that monitors human rights compliance in Latin America. That report is worth reading in full, but I will quote only the major conclusions:

> "With respect to the human rights practices of the contras, we have examined the Administration's claims for the moral character of these insurgents and find, to the contrary, that the contras have systematically engaged in the killing of prisoners and the unarmed, including medical and relief personnel; selective attacks on civilians and indiscriminate attacks; torture and other outrages against personal dignity; and the kidnappings and harassment of refugees. We find that the most violent abuses of human rights in Nicaragua today are being committed by the contras, and that the Reagan Administration's policy of support for the contras is, therefore, a policy clearly inimical to human rights." (Supp. Ann. E, IV, pp. 409-410.)

showed yesterday, is the life-blood of the contras. They were unorganized and ineffective bands of ex-National Guardsmen before the presidential decision to undertake covert action against Nicaragua. They were, as Commander Carrión said, confined to stealing catttle in the border areas (p. 13, supra). They themselves were conscious of their impotence. In fact, until the CIA came along, the contras were incapable of anything more (pp. 13-14; Supp. Ann. G, para. 7). When the CIA entered the scene, however, Colonel Bermudez, the leader of one of these groups, who was to become the chief military commander of the contras, said: "I could feel the steps of a giant animal" (Ann. F, No. 88, p. 284).

The capability to mount sustained offensives or deep penetration into Nicaraguan territory that Commander Carrión described was exclusively the result of this United States presence. The ebb and flow of their offensives coincided with the rise and fall of United States financing (p. 16, supra).

The story of Dewey Maroni — actually Duane Clarridge the CIA manager of the operation — moving onto the scene in Tegucigalpa and making dispositions for every phase of the contra activities is a classic instant of instigation. He was active on all fronts: supply and armament, tactics, command systems, the organization of a "respectable" political directorate, greasing the wheels in the CIA and with Congress (Supp. Ann. G, paras. 20, 22, 26, 29). By themselves, without the impetus from Clarridge and others like Colonel North, and without the millions of dollars they brought with them, the contras could not have established or maintained the momentum required for the activities they did in fact undertake. Even as it was, they needed and got constant and direct reassurance — from Clarridge, Casey, North, Lehman and many others — that the President was with them and that the United States would stay the course until the present Government was finally ousted from Managua (see generally, Supp. Ann. G).

I thank the Court for its indulgence in listening again to a recital of evidence that we have heard before, this time packaged, not along the lines that Mr. Reichler and I laid out yesterday, but in relation to these headings, rubrics and formulations used by the scholars of international law.

I said at the outset that this case marks the first time the Court is called upon to speak comprehensively on Article 2 (4). The Court has not been altogether silent on the question of the use of force, however. What it has said was not in the context of a case brought under Article 2 (4). Its words are few and they were uttered almost 40 years ago. But they still resonate with the values expressed in the Charter provision. This was in the Corfu Channel case:

> "The Court can only regard the alleged right of intervention as the manifestation of a policy of force, such as has, in the past, given rise to most serious abuses and such as cannot, whatever be the present defects in international organization, find a place in international law. Intervention is perhaps still less admissible in the particular form it would take here; for, from the nature of things, it would be reserved for the most powerful States . . ." (I.C.J. Reports 1949, p. 35.)

The last sentence of that passage is especially noteworthy in the present context. It shows the understanding of a Court speaking when the principles and purposes of the Charter were still fresh, that prohibitions in international law against the use of force have much to do with protection of the weak against the strong. In that case, the Court stood with a small, one might say outcast State, against one of the historic naval powers of Europe. As in Corfu Channel, the United States use of force here is still less admissible in the particular form it would take; for, from the nature of things it would necessarily be reserved for the most powerful States.

THE ORGANIZATION OF AMERICAN STATES CHARTER

The Application in this case also asserts that the actions of the United States are in violation of the Charter of the Organization of American States. The specific provisions in issue are Articles 20 and 21:

> "The territory of a State is inviolable; it may not be the object, even temporarily, of military occupation or of other measures of force taken by another State, directly or indirectly, on any grounds whatever . . ." (Art. 20.)
> "The American States bind themselves in their international relations not to have recourse to force except in the case of self-defence in accordance with existing treaties or in fulfillment thereof." (Art. 21.)

In their substantive provisions, these Articles are essentially the same as those of the United Nations Charter. The reference in Article 21 to existing treaties to define the right of self-defence is a reference to the United Nations Charter. Article 20, it can be said, is even more explicit than Article 2 (4) in proscribing "measures of force taken directly or indirectly against another State" and in limiting the purposes to zero for which such measures can be used. It follows that since, as Nicaragua has shown, the conduct of the United States violates the prohibition of Article 2 (4), it also violates the Charter of the Organization of American States.

Nevertheless, it is important to spend a few moments on the Organization of American States Charter. The reason is not that its provisions are necessarily wider than those of Article 2 (4). The reason is that the Organization of American States Charter, unlike that of the United Nations, is not a universal obligation, but one that prevails among a geographically specific group of States to which both of the Parties belong, and it reflects the painful lessons of their common history and experience. It is a separate undertaking that the United States has given to the countries of the western hemisphere and therefore has special weight in this proceeding.

The historical background against which these provisions were drafted is set forth in Nicaragua's Memorial. To summarize it in the briefest form, it consists of over a century of almost continuous United States intervention by force under claim of right in the affairs of the countries of Latin America; especially Central America and the Caribbean.

The most explicit justification for this course of conduct was the Roosevelt corollary — Theodore Roosevelt — to the Monroe Doctrine, enunciated in 1904. He said:

> "chronic wrongdoing or an impotence which results in a general loosening of the ties of civilized society may in America, as elsewhere, ultimately require intervention by some civilized nation" (6 Moore, A Digest of International Law 967 (1906)).

Whatever the plausibility of this pronouncement in the turn-of-the-century context in which it was uttered, it could not survive the change in the basic assumptions of international relations that has marked the past 75 years. The principal preoccupation of Latin American international legal scholarship over that period was to deny the United States claim to a rightful authority to police by force the internal or external policies or governmental arrangements of other countries in the hemisphere. And a major objective of the concerted diplomacy of Latin America in the 1920s and 1930s was to secure the renunciation of that claim.

President Franklin Roosevelt launched a new policy with his "good neighbour" policy in 1933. In a series of Pan-American conferences in the 1930s, the principles and language that were ultimately embodied in the Organization of American States Charter were hammered out and finally accepted by the United States. This development culminated in 1948 in the formation of the Organization of American States and the adoption of its Charter.

The Final Acts of the Pan-American conferences of the 1930s resulted in obligations for the United States from the standpoint of international law. But the OAS Charter was the first of the agreements renouncing the claimed right to intervene that was ratified as a treaty with the advice and consent of the Senate in accordance with the process mandated by Article II of the United States Constitution.

The conduct that the OAS Charter was designed to forbid was the very conduct and by the very State that is the Respondent in this lawsuit. The undertaking of the United States has special meaning to the countries of the Caribbean and Central America, which has been the object of repeated military occupation by United States forces. Nicaragua itself was under military occupation on and off for a century and continuously from 1909 to 1933, a period of over 20 years. The Applicant in this lawsuit, therefore, was supposed to be a particular beneficiary of the provision of the OAS Charter that it invokes.

THE MULTILATERAL TREATY RESERVATION

The Court decided in its Judgment on the jurisdiction of the Court and the admissibility of the Application that:

> "the objection based on the multilateral treaty reservation of the United States Declaration of Acceptance does not possess, in the circumstances of the case, an exclusively preliminary character, and that consequently it does not constitute an obstacle for the Court to entertain the proceedings . . ." (I.C.J. Reports 1984, pp. 425-426).

This issue need not detain us long. It was fully discussed by both parties at the jurisdictional phase and again in Nicaragua's Memorial on the merits. Nicaragua stands on its arguments made in those times and places and they need not be repeated here. The remarks on the subject in the Judgment of the Court, however, and in the separate opinions of several of the Judges have provided considerable instruction on the matter and warrant emphasis here.

In the first place, as the Court said, a State making a reservation to its declaration under the optional clause will not be acting for the benefit of third parties. This is especially true as to third parties that have themselves accepted the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court and so are in a position to protect their own interests, either by intervention or by the initiation of separate proceedings against the applicant. Judge Ruda said:

> "it does not seem logical that a State submitting a declaration accepting the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court, but excluding certain matters affecting its own interests from that jurisdiction, should act on behalf of third States" (I.C.J. Reports 1984, p. 456).

His review of the legislation history of the multilateral treaty reservation demonstrates that it is fully in accord with that conclusion and it is not necessary to recapitulate that review here.

Nicaragua would also recall the Court's observation that El Salvador, Honduras and Costa Rica, the States said to be affected by the Judgment have all > "made declarations of acceptance of the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court and are free, at any time, to come before the Court, on the basis of Article 36, paragraph 2, with an application instituting proceedings against Nicaragua . . . Moreover, these States are also free to resort to the incidental procedures of intervention under Articles 62 and 63 of the Statute" (I.C.J. Reports 1984, p. 425).

This consideration is especially weighty in the present phase of the case. El Salvador, the State said to be chiefly concerned, filed a declaration of intervention in the jurisdictional phase. The application was denied as premature, but the Court was careful to preserve El Salvador's rights to intervene on the merits. We have now reached the end of the merits phase, and El Salvador has yet to appear, although it found itself fully capable of defining its own interests and acting to protect them in the earlier phase.

The proviso is not designed to protect third parties. It was meant to protect the interests of the United States. What these might be Judge Ruda has also defined with clarity. The problem envisaged is that in a case arising under a multilateral treaty, the United States, as defendant, might be bound by a judgment to a certain course of action when other parties to the same treaty who were not parties to the case would be able to pursue that very course of action to the detriment of the United States. For example, in a dispute between the United States and another party to a multilateral fisheries agreement, the judgment might establish limits on the catch to which the United States was entitled. But these limitations would not apply by operation of the judgment to other parties to the agreement that were not before the Court. They would remain "juridically free", in Judge Ruda's words (I.C.J. Reports 1984, p. 456), to fish in disregard of the limitations expressed in the Judgment. Finally, and most important, with the record now closed it can be seen clearly that the Judgment cannot affect third parties. What has been revealed is a use of force in blatant violation of international law. No third State can have a right to its continuance.

Nicaragua has already adverted both in its Memorial and its oral pleadings to the difficulty in which it is placed in regard to the issue of self-defence by virtue of the provisions of Article 53. But in the present posture of the case, these difficulties are more theoretical than real. Nicaragua submits that the Court can dispose of the issue — to its entire satisfaction — on any one of three grounds.

1. As a factual matter, there has been no "armed attack" against El Salvador or any other State in the region within the meaning of Article 51. Even under the so-called "non-restrictive" view of the scope of the inherent right of self-defence, the facts show no use of force nor any other kind of physical threat by Nicaragua to its neighbours.

2. Even on the counter-factual assumption that there were such a threat, the response of the United States does not meet the requirements of necessity and proportionality that are universally agreed to be limitations on the right.

3. The purpose of the United States actions is to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua and that purpose is fundamentally inconsistent with the inherent right of self-defence.

I want to say only a few words on each of these points.

(1) Armed attack: Nicaragua produced concrete and credible evidence all of which shows that it was not supplying arms to El Salvador either now or in the relevant past (pp. 31, 52, 57-58, supra; Ann. B). The Court cannot, I believe, discuss this evidence on the basis of newspaper reports or generalities issuing from the United States State Department or the White House. In questioning from the Bench, the allegations in El Salvador's Declaration of Intervention were referred to. The short answer to those allegations is that El Salvador, like the United States, had every opportunity to appear in these proceedings and submit proof of its allegations. Indeed, the Court's Order on the Declaration in effect invites it to do so.

Whatever Article 53 means, it is not a licence to speculate. Neither is it a means by which the Respondent, by staying out of Court, can shift the burden of proof to the Applicant on issues that are properly matters of affirmative defence.

(2) Proportionality: Whatever their views on the occasions when self-defence is permitted under international law, all the publicists agree that the scope of the right is limited by the magnitude of the threat. What is the threat alleged in this case? That Nicaragua is providing the guerrillas in El Salvador with arms and supplies and some other limited forms of support. If collective self-defence is legally warranted against such action, there is certainly a great deal of room to meet it without using force against Nicaragua. It is simply incredible that the resources of the United States, Honduras and El Salvador combined are insufficient to prevent a significant flow of arms from reaching El Salvador from Nicaragua, with which it has no common land frontier.

Judge Schwebel suggested in questions to a witness that the reason there has been no supply of arms is that the military and paramilitary activities undertaken by the United States and the contras have induced Nicaragua to stop it. The United States, he suggested, has demonstrated that:

> "a policy of sending arms to insurgents in El Salvador had a price, and they feared it might have an even greater price, and therefore they stopped sending arms, if indeed they did" (p. 62, supra).

The difficulty with that suggestion is that the price that can be exacted is limited by international law — in this case by Articles 2 (4) and 51 themselves. Article 51 confines the defender to what is needed to repel the "armed attack" against it, however those words are construed, — and nothing more. Those limits do not permit a four-year campaign of armed depredations by a large well-organized army attacking the vital functions deep in the target country and including widespread use of terror and indiscriminate attacks on civilians. That price is simply too high to be permitted to be charged in a world governed by law.

(3) The purpose to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua: I spent some time yesterday demonstrating the purpose of the United States policy and actions involved in this case as established in the evidence before the Court. I understand that Professor Brownlie has done the same thing this morning. I do not propose to repeat the performance a third time. I take it as conclusively established that the purpose is to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua or, in President Reagan's words, "remove it from office" (Ann. C, Attachments 1-14).

Such a purpose is fundamentally inconsistent with a claim of self-defence. Article 2 (4) is not only designed as a comprehensive prohibition on the use of force, subject to the single narrow exception of Article 51. Article 2 (4) specifically protects the political independence or territorial integrity of the State from invasion by force of arms. To permit the United States, in the circumstances of this case, to justify its conduct under the rubric of self-defence would be to let the exception swallow the rule.

Mr. President, Members of the Court, my role in the presentation of Nicaragua's case to the Court is almost done. I am deeply conscious of the burden I leave with you. We have discussed some of the authorities on the use of force under Article 2 (4) in this oral pleading, and we have cited many more in our Memorial. Yet, I have the sense that we have not seen the whole picture. When I look at the whole range of public discourse in the United States and elsewhere on the use of force in international relations, I am disconcerted. In my own country, even some of my own younger colleagues, the next generation of scholars of international law, seem ready to give up the long struggle to outlaw the use of force as an instrument of national policy — the ideal that gave birth to Article 2 (4).

A recent note in the American Journal of International Law by Professor Michael Reisman of Yale Law School says that "Article 2 (4) was part and parcel of a complex collective security process". The collapse of that process, he argues, has undermined the original understanding of the Article. Thus, he says, the use of force must be regarded as permissible when it is applied in support of community order and basic policies — presumably as determined by the State that is using force.

In the same issue of that Journal, Professor Anthony d'Amato, in a discussion of this very case, puts forward the suggestion that the use of force is permissible under Article 2 (4) to redress flagrant violations of fundamental human rights — again, presumably, as determined by the user of force.

Almost 15 years ago, Professor Thomas Franck of the New York University Law School wrote an article entitled "The Strange Death of Article 2 (4)". One of the basic causes identified for this unhappy demise is that in situations like the one presented in this case, each great power can exercise its right to come to the collective self-defence of the side it prefers.

I am by nature an optimist, however, and I am not yet ready to join my colleagues in returning to a Hobbesian international community. I believe the returns are not yet all in on the death of Article 2 (4). In particular, this Court has not yet been heard from.

All of the articles noted above mention as a central defect in the régime of Article 2 (4) the absence of an institutional process for determining authoritatively what is a prohibited use of force under that Article and what is a valid exercise of the right of self-defence under Article 51. In this case there is such an institutional process.

When Nicaragua brought its case to the Court, it was of course seeking an adjudication of its rights under international law. But is was doing more than that. It was attesting its commitment to live by the law as the Court pronounces it.

The Court, as we are all told many times, has no coercive power to enforce its decisions. It has on its side only the moral authority of the law. But in the end, its most important role, as one of our great judges said, is as teacher to the citizenry — in this instance, the citizenry of the world. The Court in this case has the opportunity to revive the original understanding of the Charter, and its message that law and not force is to resolve disputes among nations large and small. If in this case, in this Court, the citizenry of the world can see justice done and hear it spoken, we need not worry about the death of Article 2 (4).

M. PELLET: Monsieur le Président, Messieurs de la Cour, c'est un grand honneur pour moi de me présenter de nouveau devant vous et j'espère que je saurai me montrer digne de votre confiance.

Mon exposé se décomposera en deux parties bien distinctes, et bien que je sois amené à les présenter à la suite l'une de l'autre, il serait sans doute plus exact de parler de deux plaidoiries différentes que d'un exposé unique.

1. Comme je l'ai précisé il y a un instant, il m'appartient d'examiner les violations, commises par les Etats-Unis, du traité d'amitié, de commerce et de navigation conclu le 21 janvier 1956 entre ce pays et le Nicaragua.

Avant d'en arriver aux violations imputables aux Etats-Unis, il paraît nécessaire de revenir très brièvement sur les problèmes qui sont posés par cet instrument en tant que base des compétences de la Cour et sur les obstacles juridiques qui pourraient éventuellement s'opposer à son application.

2. Dans son arrêt du 26 novembre 1984, la Cour a soigneusement examiné les objections développées à cet égard par les Etats-Unis, et a conclu:

> «que, dans la mesure où les demandes formulées dans la requête du Nicaragua révèlent l'existence d'un différend sur l'interprétation ou l'application des articles du traité de 1956 ..., la Cour a compétence pour en connaître en vertu de ce traité» (C.I.J. Recueil 1984, p. 429, para. 83).

3. La cause paraît être entendue, mais il faut relever que, par une note non datée, remise à l'ambassade du Nicaragua à Washington le 1er mai dernier, le département d'Etat a notifié son intention de dénoncer ce traité d'amitié, de commerce et de navigation conformément aux dispositions de l'article XXV, paragraphe 3, de celui-ci. Avec votre permission, Monsieur le Président, je reviendrai un peu plus tard sur les motifs de cette dénonciation.

Le seul point qui importe au stade où je me trouve est que le paragraphe 3 de l'article XXV, sur le fondement duquel les Etats-Unis se sont fondés pour dénoncer le traité, dispose:

Cela signifie que le traité reste en vigueur aussi longtemps que ce préavis d'un an ne sera pas écoulé, c'est-à-dire jusqu'au 1er mai 1986, et je pense que cette constatation ne suppose pas une très longue démonstration puisque les Etats-Unis eux-mêmes, dans la note non datée dont je viens de parler, semblent reconnaître qu'il en est bien ainsi. Cette note a été remise au Greffe il y a quelques jours (annexe suppl. K).

Durant la phase précédente, les Etats-Unis ont invoqué — ou semblaient invoquer — deux circonstances de ce type, dont on peut dire pour simplifier que la base juridique est distincte, mais dont la consistance est, somme toute, extrêmement voisine. D'une part, les Etats-Unis d'Amérique ont fait valoir l'excuse de légitime défense; d'autre part, ils ont évoqué les alinéas c) et d) de l'article XXI, paragraphe 1, du traité de 1956 lui-même.

> « 1. Le présent traité ne fera pas obstacle à l'application de mesures:
> d) nécessaires à l'exécution des obligations de l'une ou l'autre Partie relatives au maintien ou au rétablissement de la paix et de la sécurité internationales ou à la protection des intérêts vitaux de cette Partie en ce qui concerne sa sécurité. »

ces instruments ne fournissent aucune espèce de fondement juridique aux actes et aux comportements des Etats-Unis. Par conséquent, il n'est pas nécessaire de s'y appesantir, pas plus d'ailleurs que sur l'excuse générale de légitime défense puisque la question a déjà été abordée au nom du Nicaragua par MM. Brownlie et Chayes, et avec plus de talent et d'autorité que je n'en ai.

J'ajouterai seulement que c'est, à vrai dire, prendre le problème à l'envers : ce n'est pas parce que la paix et la sécurité internationales sont menacées que les Etats-Unis ne se conforment pas aux dispositions du traité de 1956 ; c'est au contraire parce qu'ils ne respectent pas les obligations énoncées dans le traité — qui sont aussi des obligations résultant de règles coutumières — que la paix et la sécurité internationales sont menacées, et il ne faut pas inverser l'ordre des choses.

7. Quant à l'excuse tirée des nécessités liées à « la protection des intérêts vitaux » des Etats-Unis en ce qui concerne leur sécurité, c'est-à-dire fondée sur la fin de l'alinéa d), paragraphe 1, de l'article 21 de notre traité, donc à l'excuse tirée des nécessités liées à la protection des intérêts vitaux des Etats-Unis, en ce qui concerne leur sécurité, elle renvoie à la circonstance excluant l'illicéité des faits internationaux généralement désignés comme étant l'« état de nécessité » dont M. Ago rappelait devant la Commission du droit international qu'il ne constitue une excuse admissible « que si cette excuse a un caractère absolument exceptionnel » (Annuaire de la Commission du droit international, 1980, t. I, p. 144). Il ajoutait :

La Commission du droit international a à cet égard pleinement fait siennes les vues de son rapporteur spécial et, commentant l'article 33 de son projet d'articles consacré à la reponsabilité internationale, la Commission note :

Sauf à entrer dans de longues discussions, il est toujours difficile d'administrer une preuve négative ; mais, en l'espèce, je ne pense pas m'aventurer beaucoup en affirmant que rien dans la présente situation ne s'apparente, de près ou de loin, avec les cas extrêmes mentionnés par la Commission sauf peut-être pour le Nicaragua, mais certainement pas si ces cas extrêmes sont vus du côté des Etats-Unis. Comme le Nicaragua l'a montré dans son mémoire, c'est à la Cour qu'il appartient d'apprécier les assertions des Etats-Unis sur ce point. Mais il paraît plus qu'hasardeux, Monsieur le Président, de soutenir que la seule présence d'un gouvernement dont les choix politiques, économiques et sociaux déplaisent aux Etats-Unis, ceci dans un petit pays d'Amérique latine n'ayant aucune frontière commune avec les Etats-Unis, peut menacer, d'une manière quelconque, les « intérêts vitaux des Etats-Unis en ce qui concerne [leur] sécurité ».

On peut transposer ici le raisonnement que mon savant collègue, M. Brownlie, a développé ce matin devant vous, s'agissant de la seule légitime défense.

Une précision cependant est ici nécessaire à titre liminaire: plus une règle est bien établie, plus les sources mêmes de cette règle sont nombreuses et concordantes. Or dans cette affaire, Monsieur le Président, les manquements imputés aux Etats-Unis constituent autant de violations de principes tout à fait fondamentaux du droit international, et on ne peut, dès lors, s'étonner que ces principes soient consacrés par des sources nombreuses de natures diverses, par des coutumes, par des traités multilatéraux ou bilatéraux, et sans doute même par des principes généraux de droit.

Dans la présente affaire en effet, la confrontation systématique des faits et des comportements reprochés aux Etats-Unis par le Nicaragua aux diverses dispositions du traité du 21 janvier 1956 conduit à des conclusions tout à fait identiques à celles que l'on peut faire en prenant en considération les chartes des Nations Unies ou de l'Organisation des Etats américains et les principes du droit international coutumier. En d'autres termes, les dommages subis par le Nicaragua, du fait des activités militaires et paramilitaires des Etats-Unis, ou menées à leur instigation, trouvent leur origine aussi bien dans le non-respect par ce pays de la Charte des Nations Unies, de la charte de l'Organisation des Etats américains, ou dans la violation des obligations imposées par des normes coutumières, ou encore, dans le manquement aux obligations particulières qu'ils ont acceptées par le traité d'amitié, de commerce et de navigation de 1956.

10. Ce que je veux dire, Monsieur le Président, c'est que la confrontation à laquelle je vais procéder dans un instant recoupe inévitablement très largement les exposés qui ont été ou qui vont être présentés, par ailleurs, au nom du Nicaragua. Cependant, comme l'a relevé M. Ago, dans son opinion individuelle jointe à l'arrêt du 26 novembre 1984 (C.I.J. Recueil 1984, p. 531-532), le traité de 1956, s'il ne permet guère de grands développements sur le plan des principes — encore qu'il en permette sans doute quelques-uns —, a le mérite d'obliger à la rigueur; il me semble que M. le président Singh et MM. Oda et sir Robert Jennings partagent au fond ce sentiment (ibid., p. 446, 472 et 557).

Cela veut dire, Monsieur le Président, que des grands principes que mon collègue Abram Chayes a magistralement présentés devant vous il y a quelques instants, il faut passer à un examen plus austère de règles plus techniques. L'analyse y gagnera peut-être en précision, elle y perdra certainement en émotion et sans doute en force de conviction.

11. Et cependant, même avec la volonté d'être précis, il ne serait pas légitime de procéder à cette confrontation article par article sans avoir, auparavant, pris en considération le traité de 1956 dans son ensemble. Car il apparaît que si les Etats-Unis ont violé de nombreuses dispositions précises de cet accord, ils l'ont aussi, et peut-être surtout, vidé globalement de toute substance, de toute signification et de toute portée.

Je m'efforcerai donc d'établir, dans un premier temps, que les Etats-Unis d'Amérique ont privé le traité d'amitié, de commerce et de navigation du 21 janvier 1956 de son objet et de son but et, dans un second temps, qu'ils n'ont, en outre, pas respecté les obligations particulières qui leur incombent en vertu d'un grand nombre des dispositions de ce traité.

I. Les Etats-Unis ont privé le traité de 1956 de son objet et de son but

A. Le traité de 1956 a une portée générale

13. Sans doute, ainsi que l'a relevé la Cour au paragraphe 47 de son arrêt sur la compétence et la recevabilité de la requête, cet accord constitue «à première vue» une base de compétence «plus étroite dans sa portée que la compétence résultant des déclarations faites par les deux Parties en vertu de la clause facultative» (C.I.J. Recueil 1984, p. 426). Et il est vrai que, en apparence au moins, le champ d'application du traité de 1956 est plus limité que celui couvert par la requête du 9 avril 1984.

Cette première impression, et la Cour dit bien qu'il s'agit d'une réaction «à première vue», doit cependant être nuancée.

En effet si, à certains égards — limités on le verra —, la base de compétence constituée par le traité est plus étroite que celle résultant des déclarations des Parties en vertu de l'article 36, paragraphe 2, du Statut, cet accord peut, comme le soulignait M. Ago:

> «se montrer à l'application beaucoup plus à même qu'on ne le pense, d'englober dans son cadre, non pas complètement si l'on veut, mais peut-être sous une forme plus rigoureuse et mieux définie, les questions litigieuses qui opposent les Parties» (C.I.J. Recueil 1984, p. 531-532).

Le traité du 21 janvier 1956 recouvre en effet la plus grande partie des problèmes soulevés par la requête du Nicaragua. D'une part, s'il est un traité de commerce, il l'est au sens le plus large du terme et nombre de griefs articulés par le Nicaragua tiennent précisément aux violations par les Etats-Unis de ce que l'on pourrait appeler le jus communicationis garanti par l'accord de 1956. D'autre part, ce traité est aussi un traité d'amitié, au sens plein de l'expression — et c'est bien le comportement, pour le moins inamical des Etats-Unis à l'égard du Nicaragua, qui est en cause. Enfin, il apparaît que le traité de 1956 doit être lu comme un tout et que les dispositions « commerciales » et les « clauses d'amitié » qu'il contient sont étroitement interdépendantes.

Je me propose de revenir de manière un peu plus détaillée sur chacun de ces trois points.

Le Nicaragua ne conteste nullement que cet accord soit, entre autres choses mais très évidemment aussi, un traité de commerce. Mais, s'il est commercial, il l'est au sens le plus large du terme.

Il n'est pas sans intérêt de relever à cet égard que le seul auteur que les Etats-Unis aient cité dans leur contre-mémoire du 17 août 1984, page 408, M. Hermann Walker, est en plein accord avec cette analyse. Il écrit par exemple, et ceci dans le passage qu'ont cité les Etats-Unis :

Elargissant ses perspectives, le même auteur précise dans une autre étude, publiée elle-aussi en 1958, l'année même où le traité conclu entre les Etats-Unis et le Nicaragua est entré en vigueur :

> « They [ce sont toujours les traités d'amitié, de commerce et de navigation] are designed to establish the ground rules regulating economic intercourse in the broad sense, and they accordingly must reflect a meeting of minds regarding proper international standards of behavior on a variety of subject matters. » (Hermann Walker Jr., « The Post-War Commercial Treaty Program of the United States », Political Science Quarterly, 1958, p. 57.)

Ces vues sont confirmées par la doctrine et la jurisprudence américaines elles-mêmes, dont le Nicaragua a reproduit des extraits significatifs dans son mémoire (voir notamment IV, p. 101 et 111).

De tous ces éléments, du préambule du traité, de son contenu — qui couvre un champ extrêmement vaste —, de sa structure — il est si l'on peut dire « construit en U » et part de considérations très générales, puis il précise certains points avant de revenir à des principes de vaste portée —, de tout cela on peut dire que les dispositions « commerciales » du traité d'amitié, de commerce et de navigation de 1956 correspondent à la définition la plus large du « commerce international » donnée par le Dictionnaire de la terminologie du droit international, établi sous la direction du président Jules Basdevant. Il y est dit que le mot « commerce » est un : miques, politiques, intellectuels entre Etats et entre leurs ressortissants» (Sirey, Paris, 1960, p. 126).

Ainsi, il apparaît que ce traité de 1956, s'il est «de commerce», l'est au sens le plus large du terme et que c'est un véritable jus communicationis qu'il entend promouvoir — et pas seulement le commerce, traduction du mot anglais trade.

b) Un traité d'amitié au sens plein du terme

16. Cette constatation n'exclut aucunement que le traité du 21 janvier 1956 soit aussi un traité d'amitié.

En effet, qu'un traité contienne des clauses commerciales est une chose; qu'il soit, pour autant, de nature exclusivement commerciale en est une autre bien différente. Et, en l'espèce, ce n'est certainement pas le cas du traité conclu il y a près de trente ans entre le Nicaragua et les Etats-Unis.

Cela est attesté d'abord par son intitulé même — il n'est pas besoin d'insister: c'est un traité d'amitié, de commerce et de navigation —, par son préambule, par nombre de ses dispositions, et par l'esprit dans lequel il a été conclu et appliqué. Ceci, Monsieur le Président, a été développé dans le mémoire du Nicaragua; je n'insisterai que sur des points sur lesquels le mémoire a été relativement rapide.

17. Le préambule énonce l'objectif du traité et indique, on ne peut plus clairement, qu'il s'agit de «resserrer les liens de paix et d'amitié qui unissent traditionnellement les deux pays». Il n'est ni nécessaire, ni sans doute souhaitable, d'entrer ici dans la querelle doctrinale, tout à fait passionnante, mais assez abstraite, de savoir si les termes utilisés dans le préambule d'un accord international ont, par eux-mêmes, une valeur obligatoire. Il suffit de rappeler que, codifiant ce qui est, sans hésitation possible, le droit coutumier minimum, l'article 31 de la convention de Vienne sur le droit des traités fait du préambule un élément du contexte à la lumière duquel doivent être interprétées les diverses dispositions du traité.

Cette position qui reflète la jurisprudence constante de la Cour, que le Nicaragua a rappelée dans son mémoire (IV, p. 104-105), est approuvée par une doctrine qui paraît tout à fait unanime.

Cela signifie que même si le préambule de 1956 ne crée pas de droits subjectifs en faveur du Nicaragua, il convient de lire le traité à la lumière du préambule et non pas comme les Etats-Unis ont essayé de le faire dans leur contre-mémoire sur les exceptions préliminaires (II, p. 53), d'interpréter le préambule à la lumière des autres dispositions du traité.

De même que la Cour permanente de Justice internationale s'est fondée sur le préambule de la partie XIII du traité de Versailles pour en affirmer «le caractère compréhensif» (Compétence de l'OIT pour la réglementation internationale des conditions du travail des personnes employées dans l'agriculture, avis consultatif, 1922, C.P.J.I. série B n° 2, et Compétence de l'OIT pour l'examen de propositions tendant à organiser et à développer les moyens de production agricole, avis consultatif, 1922, C.P.J.I. série B n° 3, p. 25), de même la lecture du préambule du traité d'amitié, de commerce et de navigation du 21 janvier 1956 montre, sans aucun doute, que les Etats-Unis et le Nicaragua ont entendu conférer à ce traité la plus vaste portée et ne pas en limiter l'objet à la réglementation de leurs relations commerciales.

Il en résulte au moins deux conséquences:

i) si certaines clauses peuvent être interprétées aussi bien de manière étroitement commerciale que de façon plus large, c'est la seconde méthode qui doit prévaloir, car tout raisonnement inverse serait contraire à l'intention clairement exprimée par les parties dans le préambule; et

ii) autant il est légitime de donner leur plein effet aux dispositions de nature commerciale figurant dans le traité, autant il ne saurait y avoir la moindre raison de priver d'effet juridique les dispositions du traité qui n'ont pas de portée commerciale.

18. Indépendamment même des considérations tirées du préambule, cette conclusion s'impose du seul fait que l'on ne saurait présumer que des dispositions qui figurent dans un accord international sont dénuées de toute signification et de tout effet.

Comme l'avait rappelé avec une grande fermeté la commission des réclamations anglo-américaines en 1926, dans l'affaire des Indiens Cayuga:

> « nothing is better settled, as a canon of interpretation in all systems of law, than that a clause must be so interpreted as to give it a meaning rather than to deprive it of meaning» (British-American Claims Commission (président Nerincx, AJIL, 1926, p. 587)), et la jurisprudence de la Cour permanente d'arbitrage, par exemple dans l'affaire des Pêcheries de l'Atlantique Nord (RSA, XI, p. 198), ou celle de la Cour, par exemple dans les arrêts relatifs aux Emprunts serbes, arrêt n° 14, 1929, C.P.J.I. série A n° 20, et aux Emprunts brésiliens, arrêt n° 15, 1929, C.P.J.I. série A n° 21, page 32, ou au Détroit de Corfou, fond, arrêt, C.I.J. Recueil 1949, page 24, confirme en tous points cette règle d'interprétation.

Or, une lecture purement commerciale de très nombreux articles du traité de 1956 priverait ces articles de toute portée, et priverait même ces articles de sens. Dans son mémoire (IV, p. 101-102) le Nicaragua a cité quelques-unes de ces dispositions qui n'ont rien de commercial. Par exemple, c'est le cas de l'article II, paragraphes 2 et 3; de l'article III; de l'article V, paragraphe 1; de l'article XI, paragraphe 2. Cette énumération n'est pas limitative; on peut y ajouter, par exemple, l'article IV qui impose un certain nombre de règles fondamentales en matière de protection sociale; ou bien l'article X, paragraphe 2, qui pose des principes très généraux en matière de coopération scientifique et technique; ou encore l'article XXI, paragraphe 1, alinéas c) et d), sur lequel je reviendrai, mais je pense qu'il faut noter dès maintenant qu'en réservant le cas du commerce des armes et des mesures «nécessaires à l'exécution des obligations des parties relatives au maintien ou au rétablissement de la paix et de la sécurité internationales», les deux parties ont manifesté, pour le moins, que les préoccupations liées à leur sécurité n'étaient pas absentes de leur esprit lorsqu'elles ont conclu leur accord.

D'autres dispositions peuvent avoir un sens, aussi bien si elles sont interprétées dans une perspective purement commerciale que comme des clauses d'amitié. Mais, si on ne les interprète que comme des clauses commerciales, elles s'en trouvent considérablement édulcorées et rien dans le traité ne le justifie. Tel est le cas surtout de l'article premier, sur lequel j'aurai l'occasion d'insister demain. Cette disposition qui est placée en tête du traité impose aux parties une obligation de comportement extrêmement générale et que l'on ne saurait certainement limiter abusivement au domaine du commerce, puisqu'elle impose à chaque partie d'accorder aux nationaux de l'autre partie, un traitement équitable.

19. Ceci est du reste confirmé par la pratique des traités d'amitié, de commerce et de navigation.

connaître de problèmes liés à l'application de tels traités. Dans l'affaire relative aux Droits des ressortissants des Etats-Unis d'Amérique au Maroc, ce sont bien les clauses commerciales du traité conclu entre les Etats-Unis et l'Empire chérifien de 1836 qui étaient en litige ; en revanche, les dispositions du traité de 1937 entre la France et le Siam, qu'elle a eu à appliquer dans l'affaire du Temple de Préah Vihéar, et les dispositions du traité de 1955 entre les Etats-Unis et l'Iran, qui étaient en cause dans l'affaire du Personnel diplomatique et consulaire des Etats-Unis à Téhéran, étaient typiquement des clauses non commerciales, et qui n'avaient rien à voir avec le commerce, même au sens large d'ailleurs. Au surplus, dans ce dernier cas, la disposition invoquée par les Etats-Unis était rédigée de manière analogue à l'article III, paragraphe 1, du traité de 1956 entre le Nicaragua et les Etats-Unis.

Le Nicaragua a developpé longuement ce point dans son mémoire (p. 209 et suiv.) et il a montré également que la pratique interne des Etats-Unis donne leur plein effet aux clauses non commerciales de tels traités — il me semble donc tout à fait inutile d'y revenir à cette barre.

Tous ces éléments qui se renforcent mutuellement, concourent nettement à la même conclusion : les mots et expressions « paix », « amitié », « traitement équitable », « relations amicales », « protection et sécurité les plus constantes », qui, parmi d'autres, figurent dans plusieurs dispositions du traité qui n'ont pas (ou pas seulement selon le cas) d'implications commerciales. Toutes ces dispositions, toutes ces expressions, ont un sens « ordinaire » et doivent produire le plein effet que la définition habituelle qui leur est donnée implique. Cela découle de la « règle générale d'interprétation » codifiée par l'article 31 de la convention de Vienne sur le droit des traités et dont il est là encore assez longuement fait mention dans le mémoire du Nicaragua.

Ce ne serait pas, je crois, une vision exacte des choses. D'abord, comme je l'ai indiqué, certaines dispositions relèvent à la fois de l'aspect commercial et de l'aspect amitié — c'est le cas avant tout du standard du traitement équitable repris dans l'article premier du traité. D'autre part, comme la Cour permanente l'a relevé, pour interpréter un traité :

Des raisons propres au traité du 21 janvier 1956 imposent avec une urgence particulière de suivre cette directive, d'ailleurs reprise par l'article 31 de la convention de Vienne du 23 mai 1969, et qu'il faut absolument suivre dans la présente espèce.

21. La première des raisons particulières tient à l'esprit même dans lequel cet instrument a été conclu, ou peut-être, plus exactement, à son équilibre général.

Comme l'a écrit M. le Président Elias :

> « Performance in good faith means not only mere abstention from acts

likely to prevent the due performance of the treaty, but also presupposes a fair balance between reciprocal obligations» (The Modern Law of Treaties, Oceana Publications, Sijthoff, Leiden, 1974, p. 43.)

Le Nicaragua a montré, dans son mémoire (IV, p. 102 et suiv.), que cet équilibre, si important dans tout traité, serait totalement détruit si le traité de 1956 devait être lu dans une perspective exclusivement commerciale: il est tout à fait exact que, dans les différents traités d'amitié, de commerce et de navigation qu'ils ont conclus, les Etats-Unis ont fait accepter par leurs partenaires un très grand nombre d'institutions juridiques qui relèvent essentiellement — essentiellement mais pas exclusivement d'ailleurs — du droit international du commerce, par exemple, la clause de la nation la plus favorisée ou le standard du traitement national. Mais ceci n'a été accepté par les Etats cocontractants que dans le cadre d'arrangements plus globaux qui, dans leur esprit, étaient susceptibles d'équilibrer les avantages consentis aux intérêts américains.

Cette interdépendance n'est du reste pas propre au traité de 1956 et a été exprimée dans maints instruments internationaux, on en trouve très nettement la trace, par exemple, dans le préambule et dans l'article 55 de la Charte des Nations Unies, aussi bien que dans plusieurs articles de la charte des droits et devoirs économiques des Etats. Mais, s'agissant du traité liant le Nicaragua et les Etats-Unis, cette interdépendance a été reconnue, on ne peut plus clairement, par les Etats-Unis eux-mêmes, dont la note par laquelle ils ont notifié leur intention de dénoncer cet accord dont je parlais tout à l'heure.

Dans cette note remise au Nicaragua le 1er mai 1985, les Etats-Unis écrivent — je cite presque intégralement la note, elle est très laconique:

> «In view of the policies and actions of the Government of Nicaragua against the peace and security of the Central American region in violation of the Charters of the United Nations and of the Organization of the American States, and the consequent state of relations between Nicaragua and the United States, a situation has for some time existed which is incompatible with normal relations under a treaty of friendship, commerce and navigation.» (Annexe suppl. K.)

Le Nicaragua, il est sans doute inutile de le préciser, fait toutes réserves sur les allégations des Etats-Unis. Il n'en reste pas moins que ces motifs, le fait que l'on ne peut pas appliquer le traité d'amitié, de commerce dans les conditions actuelles, induisent au moins l'accord des deux pays sur un point important: dans l'interprétation du traité, amitié et commerce doivent aller de pair.

Le rapprochement des deux mots «commerce» et «navigation» dans le titre même du traité paraît tout à fait révélateur de la logique qui a été retenue par les parties: conceptuellement distinctes (le commerce est l'objet, la navigation, le moyen), les deux notions sont étroitement liées. Sans liberté de la navigation — et du transit —, le commerce est paralysé. Et, inversement, la navigation n'a pas d'objet si la liberté des échanges n'est pas assurée.

Comme l'a remarqué le professeur René-Jean Dupuy, «le droit de la mer a été conçu historiquement comme un droit du transport» (dans R.-J. Dupuy, et D. Vignes, dir. publ., Traité du nouveau droit de la mer, Economica, Bruylant, Paris, Bruxelles, 1985, p. 229) et l'on pourrait élargir cette idée en disant que le développement historique du droit de la mer est allé de pair avec l'essor du commerce qu'il a très puissamment contribué à favoriser.

Ces liens entre la liberté du commerce et la liberté de navigation ont été mis en lumière avec beaucoup de clarté par M. Azevedo, dans l'opinion dissidente qu'il avait jointe à l'arrêt de la Cour en date du 9 avril 1949, dans l'affaire du Détroit de Corfou. M. Azevedo, prolongeant les constatations de la Cour permanente dans l'avis consultatif relatif à la Compétence de la commission européenne du Danube (avis consultatif, 1927, C.P.J.I. série B n° 14, p. 64-66), ou bien dans l'arrêt rendu dans l'affaire Oscar Chinn (1934, C.P.J.I. séries A/B n° 63), p. 65, dont le mémoire du Nicaragua cite de nombreux extraits (par. 418), écrivait:

Cette obligation générale, conséquence première du principe fondamental de la bonne foi, qui, comme l'a souligné M. Lachs, «imprègne» tout traité («General Course of Public International Law», RCADI, 1980, t. IV, n° 163, p. 198), a été violée par les Etats-Unis, en ce sens qu'ils ont vidé de sa substance le traité de 1956 dans son ensemble.

Au surplus, ces faits ne sont pas isolés; ce sont des actes nombreux, concordants et délibérés qui constituent une violation continue, massive et évidente d'un traité qui, quels que soient ses autres aspects, est d'abord — d'abord parce que les parties en ont décidé ainsi en lui donnant son titre même... — un traité d'amitié.

27. Mais ce qui vaut pour l'aspect «traité d'amitié» de notre accord vaut tout autant pour son côté «traité de commerce». Il est tout aussi clair en effet que, par leur propre action aussi bien que par les actes commis à leur instigation et sous leur contrôle, les Etats-Unis ont tenu en échec le jus communicationis que le traité de 1956 codifie.

— qu'elle a été effectuée, à partir de navires américains, par des ressortissants des Etats-Unis ou de pays d'Amérique latine liés à la CIA ;
— que les mines étaient de fabrication américaine ;
— que l'explosion des mines a gravement endommagé de nombreux navires, tant nicaraguayens qu'étrangers ;
— enfin, que le déminage a mobilisé la quasi-totalité de la flottille de pêche du Nicaragua pendant plusieurs semaines.

Voilà, Monsieur le Président, qui ne favorise pas vraiment le commerce !

— la destruction systématique des installations pétrolières du Nicaragua : celles de Benjamin Zeledon ou de Corinto, les 2 et 12 octobre 1983, ou des attaques répétées contre les pipe-lines de Puerto Sandino. Dans tous les cas, des sources officielles américaines ont révélé que la CIA était directement à l'origine de ces opérations (annexe F, pièces n°s 51 et 99), ce que confirme d'ailleurs le témoignage de M. Chamorro.

Cette situation n'aurait pas été possible sans le soutien massif accordé par les Etats-Unis aux contras, qui ont été véritablement leur «bras séculier». Mais il y a plus. De nombreux faits établissent clairement que ces destructions d'objectifs économiques relèvent d'une véritable stratégie définie et mise en œuvre à Washington. On peut lire, par exemple, dans le témoignage écrit de M. Chamorro:

La volonté systématique des Etats-Unis de rendre le Nicaragua «économiquement exsangue» est attestée également par de nombreux faits dont ils sont eux-mêmes les auteurs, tout à fait ouvertement. Tel est le cas de l'arrêt brutal de toute aide américaine au Nicaragua le 1er avril 1981; tel est le cas de la réduction de quatre-vingt-dix pour cent des importations de sucre en provenance du Nicaragua, décidée par les Etats-Unis en mai 1983, ou du veto que ceux-ci ont opposé en mars 1985 au sein de la Banque interaméricaine de développement à un prêt dont le Nicaragua aurait dû bénéficier. Ces faits sont exposés dans le mémoire du Nicaragua (IV, p. 108-109) et j'aurai l'honneur, si vous m'y autorisiez Monsieur le Président, d'y revenir demain lorsque j'évoquerai les atteintes portées par les Etats-Unis au principe général de la non-intervention dans les affaires intérieures des Etats. Bien entendu, l'embargo décidé par les Etats-Unis le 1er mai dernier constitue une preuve complémentaire et indiscutable de la volonté de ce pays d'affaiblir l'économie nicaraguayenne.

de toute substance, et cela dans ses deux « dimensions ». D'une part, en détruisant et en faisant détruire les moyens de communication et de transport du Nicaragua et en affaiblissant considérablement son potentiel économique, ils ont empêché la mise en œuvre du jus communicationis conventionnel et ils en ont rendu l'exécution impossible. D'autre part, en se livrant à des actes de recours à la force et en les commanditant, en effectuant et en encourageant des actes hostiles de toute nature contre le Nicaragua, ils ont privé de toute signification la volonté qu'ils ont affichée de renforcer l'amitié entre les deux Etats. Au surplus, ces deux constatations se renforcent et, si l'on peut dire, « s'épaulent » mutuellement.

En demandant à votre haute juridiction de constater que la responsabilité des Etats-Unis est engagée sur ce fondement, le Nicaragua ne suggère pas particulièrement que le traité doit être construit « libéralement » ou qu'il doit être interprété « largement », il lui apparaît simplement qu'il convient de lui donner ses pleins effets, tels que les parties les ont déterminés, et de considérer que les Etats-Unis, qui ont obtenu des avantages considérables en contrepartie du traité, ne sauraient aujourd'hui rejeter les obligations — commerciales et non commerciales — qu'ils ont librement acceptées il y a une trentaine d'années, pas davantage qu'ils ne peuvent récuser la définition des objectifs, fixés par eux dans le préambule, d'un commun accord avec le Nicaragua. Reprenant, à cet égard, une idée développée par lord McNair :

VINGT-CINQUIÈME AUDIENCE PUBLIQUE (20 IX 85, 10 h)

Présents: [Voir audience du 12 IX 85.]

M. PELLET: Monsieur le Président, Messieurs de la Cour. Lorsque, à la fin de l'audience d'hier, j'ai interrompu mon exposé consacré aux violations commises par les Etats-Unis d'Amérique au traité d'amitié, de commerce et de navigation du 21 janvier 1956, j'avais établi ou tenté d'établir trois points.

Premièrement, qu'aucune considération ne pouvait s'opposer à l'application de ce traité, en la présente espèce, et que toute violation de celui-ci devait entraîner la responsabilité des Etats-Unis.

Enfin, que les Etats-Unis ont par leur comportement et leurs actions privé ce traité de son objet et de son but en le vidant de sa substance aussi bien dans sa dimension commerciale que dans sa dimension amicale.

Pour terminer cet exposé, il me reste à établir que, de même que les Etats-Unis ont vidé de sa substance l'ensemble du traité d'amitié, de commerce et de navigation, de même, ils ont violé, aussi bien l'esprit que la lettre, de nombreuses dispositions de celui-ci et ce sont ces violations d'articles ou de dispositions précises du traité qui font l'objet de la seconde partie de cet exposé.

territoriales» et «clauses non territoriales», aussi bien à propos des violations de ce que j'ai appelé les «clauses d'amitié» du traité de 1956, qu'en ce qui concerne les violations de ses dispositions commerciales. Mais avant de passer à l'étude des unes et des autres il convient, je crois, de faire une place à part à l'article premier du traité qui relève à la fois des clauses d'amitié et des dispositions commerciales.

Cette clause revêt une importance tout à fait particulière. D'abord, en la plaçant en tête de leur convention, les parties ont entendu marquer l'importance qu'elles y attachaient.

Au surplus, la rédaction extrêmement générale que les parties ont retenue fait de cette disposition de très grande portée une sorte de synthèse du traité dans son ensemble, en ce sens que l'article premier concerne aussi bien le volet si l'on peut dire «commercial» du traité que son aspect «amical». Cette double appartenance est attestée par le fait que sont mentionnés dans l'article premier, d'un côté, les «nationaux et sociétés» des deux Etats — ce qui a un sens extrêmement général —, et, de l'autre, «leurs biens, entreprises et autres intérêts», ce qui a évidemment une résonance plus mercantile, bien qu'après tout les «autres intérêts» puissent être de toute nature.

— des installations de stockage de denrées alimentaires, ou de café ou de tabac, systématiquement incendiées, qu'elles appartiennent à des citoyens du Nicaragua, à des sociétés ou à des coopératives;
— l'hésitation n'est pas davantage possible s'il s'agit des réservoirs de pétrole de Corinto bombardés ou de l'oléoduc de Puerto Sandino saboté, sous la supervision directe de la CIA.

Pour les seuls besoins du raisonnement, j'efface les destructions de navires qui ont résulté du minage des ports, les pertes économiques qui sont la conséquence du bombardement des installations pétrolières, de l'aéroport de Managua, des ponts de la route panaméricaine; je gomme l'incendie des entrepôts de blé et des récoltes de café; je biffe les balles de coton qui pourrissent dans les ports et le sucre qui n'est pas acheté en dépit des engagements pris. Tout cela, on l'imagine, ne s'est pas produit. Il n'y a pas eu d'atteinte à la liberté du commerce et de la navigation... Est-ce que pour autant nous pouvons dire que les Etats-Unis ont accordé un «traitement équitable» à l'équipage du bateau-crevettier Alma Saltana qui a explosé sur une mine le 30 mars 1984 dans le port de Corinto (annexe J, p. 2). Est-ce que les Etats-Unis ont accordé un traitement équitable à plus de 20 000 habitants de Corinto qui ont dû être évacués dans des conditions difficiles tandis que brûlaient les installations pétrolières bombardées directement par les Etats-Unis (annexe F, pièces n^{os} 98 et 99). Ont-ils accordé un traitement équitable à la petite fille blessée et à ses quatre frères et sœurs tués par un tir de mortier à San Gregorio en octobre 1984 et qu'évoquait, parmi tant d'autres, le père Loison dans sa déposition mardi matin; ont-ils accordé un traitement équitable à tous ces morts, à tous ces blessés, à toutes ces femmes violées?

On peut penser, par exemple, à la mention dans le préambule, du désir des deux Etats de «favoriser entre leurs peuples respectifs l'établissement de relations ... culturelles plus étroites». On peut citer aussi l'article II, paragraphe 2, par lequel les deux parties s'engagent à encourager «les contacts mutuels entre leurs peuples» et à faciliter, «autant qu'il est possible, les voyages des touristes et des autres visiteurs».

Il convient en outre de mentionner ici une autre disposition, plus limitée dans sa portée mais qui présente, dans le contexte de la présente affaire, un intérêt tout particulier. Cette disposition c'est l'article XXI, paragraphe 1, c) et d), du traité de 1956, dont M. le Président Singh a montré, dans l'opinion individuelle jointe à l'arrêt relatif à la compétence de la Cour et à la recevabilité de la requête, qu'interprétée a contrario elle apparaissait comme une disposition de fond (C.I.J. Recueil 1984, p. 447) dont il paraît difficile de penser qu'elle a été respectée en l'espèce par les Etats-Unis, car les buts et les «nécessités» auxquels, dans le premier cas (aliéna c)), la licéité du commerce des armes, et, dans le second cas (alinéa d)), l'adoption de mesures spécifiques sont subordonnées, ne sont, à l'évidence, pas réunies en l'espèce.

C'est le cas aussi de l'article III, paragraphe 1, qui dispose:

C'est le cas enfin — je cite toujours les clauses territorialement situées du traité qui me paraissent avoir un intérêt dans notre affaire — de l'article VI, paragraphe 1:

Monsieur le Président, le Nicaragua ne nie en aucune manière que, dans les trois cas que je viens de citer, il est bien écrit: «sur les territoires de l'autre partie». Mais est-il raisonnable de considérer que, sous prétexte que le paragraphe 1 de l'article III précise que les citoyens du Nicaragua ne seront exposés à aucune molestation illégale sur le territoire des Etats-Unis, ces mêmes personnes peuvent être molestées — et le terme est ici encore, de nouveau, bien faible — par les Etats-Unis (ou sur l'ordre de ceux-ci) lorsqu'elles se trouvent au Nicaragua?

A vrai dire, ce que les trois dispositions que je viens de citer interdisent expressément sur le territoire des Etats-Unis, elles l'interdisent aussi, implicitement certes, mais à fortiori, sur le territoire du Nicaragua. (Et l'on peut remarquer, d'ailleurs, que le traité de 1956 reconnaît dans son article VIII, paragraphe 2, interprété a contrario, qu'il est possible de déduire implicitement des dispositions du traité des droits qu'il ne garantirait pas expressément.) Au surplus, toute autre interprétation irait à l'encontre des buts mêmes du traité d'amitié, de commerce et de navigation de 1956, tels qu'ils sont énoncés dans son préambule, et serait contraire aux règles les plus élémentaires du bon sens et de la bonne foi.

39. Dans cette perspective, il paraît difficile de ne pas voir dans les actions des Etats-Unis une violation des libertés qui sont garanties par l'article II, paragraphe 2, de notre traité et, en particulier, de la liberté de circulation — rendue plus que problématique par l'insécurité entretenue par la contra dans certaines zones — ou même des violations de la liberté de conscience. Il est difficile aussi de ne pas voir dans les bombardements et les sabotages auxquels se livrent les contras, sous le contrôle et pour le compte des Etats-Unis, des actions qui portent atteinte à la sécurité des biens, assurée par l'article VI, paragraphe 1. Et il paraît encore plus difficile de nier que les nombreux actes cruels, inhumains et dégradants accomplis dans les mêmes conditions, et dans le détail desquels il ne me semble pas utile de revenir ici, constituent autant de «molestations illégales», au sens de l'article III, paragraphe 1, du traité.

Le recensement systématique de ces clauses permet d'établir tout à fait nettement, me semble-t-il, que le traité du 21 janvier 1956 est très loin d'avoir une portée territoriale et exclusivement territoriale comme les Etats-Unis ont voulu le faire croire durant la première phase de cette affaire.

On peut remarquer tout d'abord que la portée proprement territoriale du traité

J'insiste sur cet article X, paragraphe 3. Il n'est pas dit « de se procurer sur le territoire de l'autre partie » ; il n'est pas dit « de se procurer aux Etats-Unis ». Il est dit simplement : « de se procurer », sans autre précision ; ce qui veut dire : de se procurer « n'importe où » ; de se procurer « aux Etats-Unis ou ailleurs ». Cette interprétation ne fait aucun doute si l'on confronte cette disposition aux nombreuses autres clauses du traité qui, pour leur part, prennent, au contraire, soin de préciser « sur le territoire de l'autre partie », ou bien « de la part de l'autre partie » ; ici, il n'y a rien de ce genre et il s'agit d'une clause importante.

Cet article XIX, paragraphe 1, dispose:

Cette rédaction, Monsieur le Président, appelle deux séries de commentaires:

En premier lieu il ne fait aucun doute que le bénéfice de cet article s'étend à la fois aux navires battant pavillon des Etats-Unis (et, sans doute, à leurs aéronefs qui sont, aujourd'hui, l'un des moyens normaux du commerce) et aux navires et aéronefs des Etats tiers. En d'autres termes, il est tout à fait clair que les agissements des Etats-Unis — sur lesquels je me suis assez longuement étendu hier et qui, depuis le début de ces audiences, ont fait l'objet de descriptions précises: le minage des ports, le bombardement de l'aéroport de Managua, la destruction des réserves de carburant de Corinto, etc. — constituent autant de violations de l'article XIX, paragraphe 1, du traité de 1956, dès lors qu'ils font échec au commerce et à la navigation entre les territoires des deux Etats, que ce commerce soit le fait de transporteurs américains ou de transporteurs du Nicaragua ou encore de transporteurs d'Etats tiers. Et ces violations par les Etats-Unis, à elles seules, suffisent à justifier que la Cour reconnaisse que la responsabilité des Etats-Unis est engagée sur le fondement de l'article XIX, paragraphe 1.

Il est du reste extrêmement révélateur que, dans son arrêt du 26 novembre 1984, la Cour elle-même, loin d'évoquer la possibilité d'une interprétation abusivement rigide de l'article XIX du traité, a présenté celui-ci comme « prévoyant la liberté de commerce et de navigation » (C.I.J. Recueil 1984, p. 428), et, à vrai dire, cette lecture paraît assez évidente.

Je vous demande seulement, Monsieur le Président, de bien vouloir m'autoriser à prendre encore quelques secondes du temps de la Cour pour résumer très brièvement les conclusions auxquelles me semblent conduire les considérations liées au traité d'amitié, de commerce et de navigation du 21 janvier 1956 que je viens de présenter.

Durant la précédente phase de cette affaire, les Etats-Unis ont affirmé avec beaucoup de conviction apparente la non-pertinence du traité d'amitié dans cette affaire. Un examen attentif montre non seulement qu'un grand nombre des dispositions de cet instrument ont été violées — soit dans leur lettre (et il y en a davantage que l'on aurait pu penser à première lecture), soit dans leur esprit parce qu'il n'est, tout simplement, plus possible de mettre ces dispositions en œuvre, et ceci, à vrai dire, vaut pour certaines dispositions aussi bien que pour le traité dans son ensemble. D'abord, bien sûr, parce qu'il s'agit d'un traité d'amitié et que force est de constater que l'actuel gouvernement des Etats-Unis a de l'amitié une conception singulière et, si l'on peut dire, fâcheusement «explosive». Cela relève de l'évidence et l'on comprend que, durant l'examen des exceptions préliminaires qu'ils ont soulevées, les Etats-Unis se soient efforcés de gommer de notre traité tout ce qui n'avait pas un caractère commercial et technique.

Monsieur le Président, les attaques armées des Etats-Unis contre le Nicaragua, leurs incursions dans ses eaux territoriales, l'utilisation de la force et de la menace de la force contre celui-ci, les atteintes portées au principe de la liberté des mers, l'interruption du commerce maritime et aérien pacifique, les dommages causés aux citoyens du Nicaragua sont autant de griefs qui sont articulés sous les lettres a) à f) de la requête du Nicaragua. Ce sont aussi des faits dont la commission n'est pas compatible avec l'idée d'un traité d'amitié, pas plus qu'elle n'est compatible avec celle d'un traité de commerce et de navigation. Les Etats-Unis, qui ont dénoncé formellement le traité en mai dernier, se sont pourtant comportés comme s'il n'existait plus depuis 1981. La responsabilité des Etats-Unis est engagée sur cette base et ils doivent réparation des dommages subis par le Nicaragua en conséquence de ces violations. Dès lors, les conclusions énoncées sur les lettres g) et h) de la requête s'appliquent pleinement aux violations par les Etats-Unis du traité de 1956.

Cela conclut, Monsieur le Président, ma première plaidoirie. Je n'ai pu éviter d'entrer dans certains détails techniques qui, d'une certaine manière, contrastent avec le «profil» général de cette affaire. Malgré cela, vous avez bien voulu ne pas manifester d'impatience et ceci m'est une raison supplémentaire de vous exprimer ma vive reconnaissance pour votre attention patiente.

The PRESIDENT: Would the Agent of Nicaragua indicate who will be the next counsel to address the Court?

Mr. ARGÜELLO GÓMEZ: Mr. Pellet will continue with the intervention of the United States in the internal affairs of Nicaragua.

M. PELLET: Monsieur le Président, Messieurs de la Cour, les hasards du partage des tâches entre les conseils du Nicaragua font que je me succède à moi-même à cette barre puisque, après avoir développé les questions liées au traité de 1956, il m'incombe d'ébaucher la discussion relative aux violations commises par les Etats-Unis de leurs obligations en vertu du droit coutumier, violations dont mon savant collègue, le professeur Brownlie, tirera les conséquences dans quelques instants sur un plan plus général.

L'INTERVENTION DES ETATS-UNIS DANS LES AFFAIRES INTÉRIEURES DU NICARAGUA

Je pense d'emblée pouvoir rassurer la Cour sur un point qui, après plus d'une semaine d'audiences, peut la préoccuper : cette seconde plaidoirie sera beaucoup plus brève que celle qu'elle vient d'écouter avec tant de bienveillance. Si je peux oser cet aveu, Monsieur le Président, je dirais respectueusement, que mon souci de ne pas importuner la Cour par une présence trop longue à cette barre est favorisé par le thème même que je dois traiter.

En effet, en se présentant devant vous dans cette affaire, les conseils du Nicaragua ont souvent éprouvé une certaine gêne, tant ils avaient le sentiment de plaider l'évidence, tant il leur a semblé à maints points de vue qu'il n'était guère nécessaire de démontrer par de longs raisonnements des atteintes au droit international que le seul énoncé des faits suffit à établir. Ce sentiment, je l'éprouve avec une acuité particulière en abordant la question de l'intervention des Etats-Unis dans les affaires du Nicaragua.

i) le principe de non-intervention constitue une règle coutumière dont l'existence est indépendante du principe de l'interdiction de recours à la force ;

ii) s'ils ne sont, à l'évidence, pas dépourvus de tous liens, les deux principes, celui de l'interdiction de l'intervention et celui de l'interdiction du recours à la force, ne se recouvrent pas et l'interdiction de l'intervention dans les affaires intérieures des Etats a une portée plus large que le principe de l'interdiction du recours à la force ;

iii) s'il n'est pas douteux que le principe de la non-ingérence est une notion à contenu variable, ou si l'on veut, « un pavillon recouvrant des marchandises extrêmement diverses », les conditions de sa violation se trouvent remplies dans la présente espèce, aussi étroite que puisse être la définition que l'on retient ;

iv) quelle que puisse être la pertinence, dans l'abstrait, des efforts doctrinaux

v) par le fait même qu'ils sont intervenus et qu'ils continuent d'intervenir dans les affaires intérieures du Nicaragua, et compte tenu des conditions dans lesquelles leur intervention se produit, les Etats-Unis contreviennent du même coup à d'autres principes fondamentaux du droit international contemporain et, en particulier, à celui de l'égalité de droits des peuples et de leur droit à disposer d'eux-mêmes et à celui de la souveraineté des Etats sur leurs ressources naturelles et leurs activités économiques.

a) le principe de non-intervention est un principe coutumier de caractère autonome;

b) le principe de non-intervention fait, en la présente espèce, l'objet de violations manifestes de la part des Etats-Unis, aussi étroite que soit la définition que l'on en donne;

c) ces violations sont indissociables d'autres manquements très graves à d'autres principes du droit international qui en sont la conséquence;

d) ces violations n'ont aucune justification juridique.

J'aborde tout de même la première.

4. L'autonomie du principe de non-intervention tient à la fois à son histoire, à ses fondements et à sa portée.

Monsieur le Président, je n'aurai pas la cuistrerie de retracer ici l'histoire du principe de la non-intervention; je crois qu'il suffit de relever que, déjà, les pères du droit international, et en particulier Vattel, affirmaient l'existence du principe, tandis que des auteurs comme Fauchille, dans son Traité de droit international public (Rousseau, Paris, 1922, p. 538 et suiv.) ou Stowell dans Intervention in International Law (J. Byrne and Co., Washington, 1921, p. 558), en faisaient la théorie bien avant l'interdiction du recours à la guerre en 1928, puis à la force, en 1945. Et, par exemple, l'arbitre Max Huber en a fait application dans son rapport sur les Responsabilités de l'Etat dans les situations visées par les réclamations britanniques en date du 1er mai 1925 (RSA, II, p. 641).

Cela montre que l'interdiction de l'ingérence trouve son fondement non pas dans la prohibition du recours à la force mais, comme l'a montré M. le président Jiménez de Aréchaga dans son cours général à l'Académie de droit international, à la fois, dans le principe de l'égalité souveraine des Etats, dans celui de leur indépendance et dans celui de l'autodétermination («International Law in the Past Third of a Century», RCADI, 1978-I, n° 112).

6. L'ancienneté du principe de non-ingérence et la solidité de son ancrage dans les règles les plus fondamentales du droit des gens en font l'un des principes, sans aucun doute, les mieux établis du droit international contemporain, quelles que soient les violations dont il est trop souvent victime; et c'est, sans aucun doute aussi, sur le continent américain que ce principe a trouvé le terrain privilégié de son épanouissement.

La Cour internationale de Justice l'a du reste relevé dans son arrêt du 20 novembre 1950, rendu dans l'affaire du Droit d'asile, lorsqu'elle a qualifié la non-intervention de: «l'une des traditions les mieux établies de l'Amérique latine» (C.I.J. Recueil 1950, p. 285), région dans laquelle elle a, en effet, été réaffirmée à d'innombrables reprises.

Il est vrai que, de ce principe, les Etats-Unis ont, pendant longtemps, eu une conception assez singulière, à travers leur double lecture de ce que l'on a appelé la doctrine de Monroe, à la fois fondement de l'exclusion de toute intervention européenne dans l'hémisphère occidental, et justification de leurs propres ingérences dans ce même hémisphère. Hésitants lors de la conférence de La Havane en 1928, les Etats-Unis n'en ont pas moins renoncé formellement à leur prétendu droit d'intervention en adoptant le protocole de Buenos Aires en 1936. Par la suite, et sans qu'il soit besoin d'entrer dans les détails, les Etats-Unis ont, à maintes reprises, proclamé leur attachement au principe de la non-intervention dont l'une des expressions les plus vigoureuses, et sans doute la plus convaincante, a probablement été donnée par le président Eisenhower dans une déclaration faite le 16 avril 1953 et que je ne peux résister à l'envie de citer:

Si, lors de l'adoption de ce texte, le représentant des Etats-Unis a déclaré que son pays — qui a voté en faveur de la résolution — y voyait une déclaration d'intention politique et non une élaboration du droit (Documents officiels de l'Assemblée générale, 20e session, première commission, comptes rendus analytiques des séances, p. 458), les Etats-Unis, en revanche, ont estimé que la célèbre déclaration 2625 (XXV) du 4 novembre 1970, dont le troisième principe reprend l'essentiel du texte de 1965, reflétait le droit existant, et était, en ce qui la concerne, une déclaration du droit; cette position correspond d'ailleurs aux vues de la doctrine la plus autorisée, qu'il s'agisse de l'opinion de M. Jiménez de Aréchaga (op. cit., p. 12 et 32), de l'opinion de M. Schwebel («Aggression, Intervention and Self-defence in Modern International Law», RCADI, t. 136,

Enfin, l'on peut mentionner en passant que, si les Etats-Unis ont voté contre la résolution 36/103 du 9 décembre 1981, portant «Déclaration sur l'inadmissibilité de l'intervention et de l'ingérence dans les affaires intérieures des Etats», les Etats-Unis ont expliqué leur vote par des motifs particuliers et non par un doute quelconque quant à la validité du principe tel que je l'analyse ici.

8. Ce très rapide survol permet de conclure, Monsieur le Président, me semble-t-il, qu'il n'existe aucune espèce de doute sur l'existence en droit international d'une règle coutumière interdisant l'ingérence des Etats dans les affaires intérieures des autres Etats dont la Cour a du reste reconnu la validité dans des termes particulièrement solennels que M. Chayes a rappelés hier dans l'affaire du Détroit de Corfou, sur laquelle, malgré tout, je serai conduit à revenir dans quelques minutes. En outre, dans son arrêt du 26 novembre 1984, la Cour a, de nouveau, souligné le caractère obligatoire du principe «en tant qu'élément du droit international coutumier» (C.I.J. Recueil 1984, p. 424). Ce principe existe; les Etats-Unis le reconnaissent; mais l'attitude de ce pays à l'égard de la non-intervention constitue un exemple typique de l'écart, dénoncé par M. le vice-président Guy de Lacharrière dans un article récent, entre «les mots et les conduites» (Mélanges Charles Chaumont, Pedone, 1984, p. 347–362). Et cela me conduit à ma deuxième proposition.

B. Les Etats-Unis ont, dans la présente espèce, violé de manière manifeste le principe de l'interdiction de l'intervention dans les affaires intérieures des Etats

9. S'il existe, Monsieur le Président, tant en doctrine que parmi les Etats, un accord unanime pour considérer que le principe de non-ingérence a une valeur coutumière indépendamment de son inclusion dans certains instruments conventionnels, l'incertitude est certainement plus grande en ce qui concerne la portée du principe de non-intervention que Quincy Wright a défini comme une «zone nébuleuse» du droit international («Non-Military Intervention», Mélanges Leo Gross, p. 5). Et force est de reconnaître que les résolutions des Nations Unies, que j'ai évoquées tout à l'heure, ne sont pas d'un très grand secours pour définir précisément ce qu'est la non-intervention; elles énumèrent des cas d'intervention illicites plus qu'elles n'en fournissent une définition générale. Les exemples que donnent ces résolutions mettent cependant en évidence les deux éléments sur lesquels, au-delà de leurs divergences, les auteurs les plus exigeants semblent d'accord. Pour que l'on puisse parler d'intervention, deux éléments doivent être réunis:

i) un ou des actes de contrainte doivent avoir été commis, ce que les Anglo-Saxons nomment une «dictatorial interference»; c'est, si l'on veut, le corpus;
ii) cet acte ou ces actes doivent avoir été commis en vue de plier leur destinataire — leur victime, pourrait-on dire — à la volonté de leur auteur; c'est l'animus.

Corpus et animus sont donc nécessaires.

10. Si l'on applique cette définition dans le différend qui oppose le Nicaragua aux Etats-Unis, il ne peut guère exister le moindre doute sur le fait que les conditions du délit international sont réunies. L'établir revient largement à revenir sur l'ensemble des faits de l'affaire. Et je ne retiendrai — d'ailleurs uniquement pour les mentionner en passant — que quelques-uns de ceux qui paraissent les plus topiques, étant entendu que le choix n'est pas aisé ; tous, ou presque, peuvent concourir à la démonstration.

11. S'agissant des objectifs poursuivis par les Etats-Unis — c'est-à-dire de l'animus —, ils ont été énoncés, avec ce dont on ne sait s'il faut le considérer comme de la naïveté ou du cynisme, par les plus hauts responsables de l'Etat. M. Chayes a rappelé mercredi la liste impressionnante des déclarations par lesquelles le président Reagan a manifesté publiquement et clairement son intention d'obliger le Gouvernement du Nicaragua à « dire pouce » (« to say Uncle »), selon l'expression qu'il a utilisée le 21 février 1985 (annexe C, pièce I-14). Bien d'autres officiels américains ont confirmé que le but des Etats-Unis était de renverser l'équipe actuellement au pouvoir à Managua ou de lui interdire de mener sur son territoire la politique qu'elle entendait suivre, d'entretenir avec les puissances étrangères les relations qui lui semblaient bonnes. Par exemple, le 27 juillet 1983, le président du Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence de la Chambre des représentants exprimait sa conviction selon laquelle les activités « secrètes » contre le Nicaragua avaient pour seul objet « to overthrow the Government of Nicaragua » (annexe E, pièce n° 3, H 5748). Le 29 janvier 1985, le secrétaire d'Etat adjoint pour les affaires américaines faisait une déclaration confirmant clairement que, de l'avis de l'administration américaine :

> « The Sandinistas can change their ways if the pressure to do so is clear ; throughout 1983 and into 1985, a variety of pressures — military exercises, naval manœuvres, internal opposition (both armed and unarmed), falling international prestige — did produce some change ... » (Annexe C, pièce II-9, IV, p. 215.)

12. L'animus, Monsieur le Président, il est vrai, ne suffit pas : c'est, après tout, le droit le plus strict d'un gouvernement de manifester son inimitié à l'encontre de celui d'un autre Etat dont il désapprouve les options ; encore est-il, pour le moins, inhabituel de procéder d'une manière aussi véhémente, s'agissant d'un Etat avec lequel on entretient des relations diplomatiques normales et auquel on est lié par un traité d'amitié.

Mais force est de constater dans notre affaire que ces déclarations ne comportent pas seulement des critiques envers le Gouvernment du Nicaragua ; elles le menacent directement — et la seule menace est en elle-même un fait internationalement illicite — et, pis encore, elles annoncent ou elles reconnaissent que des actions en vue d'atteindre ces buts sont prévues ou sont en cours. Le corpus delicti s'en trouve du même coup établi.

— que les Etats-Unis ont conçu, créé et organisé une armée de mercenaires ;
— qu'ils en ont armé, équipé et entraîné les membres ;
— qu'ils lui ont fixé ses objectifs et sa stratégie ;
— qu'ils en ont suscité, payé et contrôlé la direction politique.

Je ne reviens pas sur ces faits. Et les faits, à vrai dire, là encore, parlent d'eux-mêmes et imposent, sur le plan juridique, une conclusion incontournable : ils constituent des interventions caractérisées dans les affaires intérieures du Nicaragua.

Il ne paraît pas y avoir, sur ce point, de notes discordantes dans la doctrine (alors même que la doctrine est divisée sur le point inverse de savoir si un gouvernement en place peut bénéficier d'une assistance étrangère lorsqu'il est aux prises avec une insurrection, bien que la réponse dominante semble plutôt être positive). Fauchille voit dans cette forme d'intervention la forme « la plus dangereuse, parce qu'elle est sournoise et se cache, se fait au moyen d'agents qu'on envoie à l'étranger ou qu'on y recrute... » (op. cit., p. 542), et cela en 1922, et M. le juge Schwebel approuve la résolution 2131 (XX) de disposer :

Lors des travaux préparatoires de ce texte, les Etats-Unis en avaient du reste proposé une version plus explicite encore, puisqu'ils souhaitaient que soit condamnée :

Et le représentant américain à la première commission de l'Assemblée générale renchérissait encore en disant:

Il y a là, Monsieur le Président, une description très exacte de la manière dont, vingt ans plus tard, les Etats-Unis se comportent vis-à-vis du Nicaragua... De même, lors des travaux préparatoires des déclarations 2625 (XXV) ou 36/103, les représentants des Etats-Unis se sont félicités que ces textes condamnent expressément les interventions indirectes, sous forme notamment «de l'organisation de bandes armées en vue d'incursions sur le territoire d'un autre Etat et des actes destinés à encourager la guerre civile et le terrorisme dans d'autres pays» (ceci est la déclaration du représentant des Etats-Unis devant le comité spécial des principes du droit international touchant les relations amicales et la coopération entre les Etats en 1970) (Documents officiels de l'Assemblée générale, vingt-cinquième session, supplément n° 18 (A/8018), p. 129; voir également A/CM/PV.5, 29 décembre 1981, p. 55).

— deuxièmement, la réduction de quatre-vingt-dix pour cent du quota des importations de sucre du Nicaragua en avril 1981;
— et bien sûr, l'embargo, décidé le 1er mai 1985, sur l'ensemble du commerce en provenance ou en direction du Nicaragua.

En elles-mêmes, considérées hors de leur contexte, certaines de ces mesures peuvent être licites. On peut admettre qu'un Etat peut aider ou ne pas aider qui bon lui semble; on peut admettre qu'un Etat peut commercer ou ne pas commercer avec qui bon lui semble; et ce n'est qu'«en passant» que je relèverai qu'un groupe spécial du GATT, saisi à la demande du Nicaragua, a conclu qu'en attribuant au Nicaragua un contingent d'importations de sucre inférieur de près de quatre-vingt-dix pour cent à leurs engagements les Etats-Unis «n'avaient pas respecté les obligations qui découlent pour eux de l'accord général et, en particulier, de l'article XIII, paragraphe 2, de cet accord (ce rapport du GATT a été publié le 2 mars 1984 sous la cote L/5607). Ce n'est qu'en passant que j'indiquerai que le Nicaragua a également saisi les parties contractantes du GATT de la compatibilité des mesures d'embargo commerciales adoptées par le président des Etats-Unis le 1er mai 1985 avec les dispositions du GATT, et que cette plainte est actuellement sous examen. Ce n'est aussi que «pour mémoire» que je rappellerai que ces mesures, dans leur ensemble, ne sont compatibles ni avec la lettre ni avec l'esprit du traité de 1956.

Mais indépendamment de ces illicéités, qui atteignent ces mesures de contrainte économique prises individuellement, tous ces faits, pris ensemble, constituent en outre une atteinte systématique au principe fondamental de la non-intervention dans les affaires intérieures du Nicaragua.

Ce n'est pas le lieu, Monsieur le Président, d'exposer, moins encore de prendre parti, dans les querelles doctrinales relatives à la licéité des mesures de contrainte économique «dans l'abstrait». Pour mon propos, adoptant la même démarche que celle que j'ai suivie tout à l'heure pour définir la non-intervention, je pense qu'il suffit de prendre pour point de départ le point de vue extrêmement restrictif adopté dans un très récent article publié dans l'American Journal of International Law, par M. Tom J. Farer, qui considère — je lui laisse entièrement la responsabilité de ces vues — que «la coercition n'a rien d'illégal» («there is nothing illegal about coercion», AJIL, 1985, p. 406), notamment en ce qui concerne la coercition économique; mais, tout à la fin de cet article, qui n'est qu'une démonstration de cette proposition, l'auteur est conduit à nuancer ainsi cette opinion:

« In defining economic aggression, I myself would be willing to go no further than treating economic coercion as aggression when, and only when, the objective of the coercion is to liquidate an existing State or to reduce that State to the position of a satellite. There must, moreover, be a connection between the attempt at coercion and the realization of its objective.» (AJIL., 1985, p. 413.)

C. Les violations du principe de non-intervention par les Etats-Unis ne peuvent être dissociées de manquements graves à d'autres principes du droit international qui en sont la conséquence

16. J'en arrive à ma troisième proposition, que j'aborderai de façon extrêmement brève, elle est la suivante : les violations du principe de non-intervention par les Etats-Unis ne peuvent pas être dissociées ici de manquements graves à d'autres principes du droit international qui en sont la conséquence. De l'exposé oral qu'il a présenté à la Cour dans l'affaire du Sahara occidental, l'éminent juriste qui n'était pas encore le juge Bedjaoui rappelait que la première fonction du principe de l'autodétermination était « d'exclure toute forme d'ingérence dans les affaires intérieures des nations » (C.I.J. Mémoires, vol. IV, p. 497), principe que formulent du reste les déclarations 2131 (XX) et 2625 (XXV) de l'Assemblée générale.

En menant des activités militaires et paramilitaires au Nicaragua et contre celui-ci, en entretenant une guerre extérieure dont l'objet est précisément de changer par la force le régime existant, les Etats-Unis vident cette norme fondamentale — souvent considérée comme une règle de jus cogens — de toute substance.

17. Du même coup ils contreviennent à cet autre principe, corollaire du précédent, qu'exprime le paragraphe suivant de l'article premier des deux pactes de 1966, garantissant à chaque peuple le droit de disposer librement de ses richesses et de ses ressources naturelles. En menant et en entretenant une guerre économique les Etats-Unis s'efforcent, en contradiction de nouveau avec les termes mêmes de l'article premier, paragraphe 2, des deux pactes de 1966, de priver le peuple nicaraguayen «de ses propres moyens d'existence».

Rapportées aux faits, Monsieur le Président, ces considérations très rapides me paraissent suffire à établir que les violations du principe de non-intervention lui-même, sur lesquelles je me suis attardé davantage, constituent aussi, par le seul fait qu'elles sont commises, des manquements à d'autres règles tout aussi fondamentales du droit international de ce temps.

19. J'aborde pour terminer, en quelques minutes très brèves, ma quatrième proposition qui est la suivante: les violations du principe de non-intervention par les Etats-Unis n'ont aucune justification.

— l'intervention dite d'«humanité» en vue de protéger les ressortissants de l'Etat qui intervient;

Il est vrai qu'à ces deux hypothèses d'interventions, dont il est quelquefois allégué qu'elles sont licites, s'en ajoute une troisième qui résulte de nombreuses résolutions des Nations Unies appelant tous les Etats à apporter leur appui aux peuples en lutte contre une domination coloniale ou étrangère ou contre un régime raciste. Décolonisé en 1821, ne pratiquant aucune forme de discrimination raciale, le Nicaragua, s'il est occupé — très partiellement d'ailleurs —, ne l'est que par les forces mercenaires contrôlées et dirigées par les Etats-Unis.

21. Dans une note parue l'an dernier, M. Oscar Schachter estime qu'admettre le droit pour un Etat d'intervenir à l'étranger pour rétablir ce qui lui paraît la vraie démocratie

> « would introduce a new normative basis for recourse to war that would give powerful States an almost unlimited right to overthrow governments alleged to be unresponsive to the popular will or the goal of self-determination » (AJIL, 1984, p. 649).

Ces vues, la Cour, dans son arrêt de 1949, les a pleinement partagées. Le professeur Chayes en a cité le passage pertinent et je ne pense pas qu'il soit utile de le lire de nouveau, sauf pour rappeler que la Cour a considéré que « les formes d'intervention qui lui étaient soumises étaient d'autant plus inacceptables qu'elles étaient réservées par la nature des choses aux Etats les plus puissants » (C.I.J. Recueil 1949, p. 35).

Cet avertissement, les Etats-Unis ne l'ont pas entendu. Ils ne se sont imposés aucun frein, aucune limite : leur bon plaisir leur a tenu lieu de règle ; leur puissance leur a tenu lieu de droit, alors même, comme la Cour l'a rappelé il y a trente-cinq ans, que cette puissance leur imposait des obligations spéciales d'agir avec modération.

La diversité des manifestations d'interventions des Etats-Unis dans les affaires du Nicaragua, leur nombre, leur gravité me paraissent conduire, Monsieur le Président, aux deux constatations suivantes :

i) d'abord, considérée isolément, prise en elle-même, chacune de ces interventions — et je n'en ai donné que quelques exemples — est contraire au principe de la non-ingérence ;

ii) ensuite, la concordance de ces interventions illicites qui, d'évidence s'intègrent dans un plan concerté, délibéré, d'intimidation et de pressions, impose cependant de sortir du cadre étroit du droit de la non-intervention au sens strict, car au fond, Monsieur le Président, c'est tout le droit international ou presque qui est en cause dans cette affaire et c'est ce que le professeur Brownlie montrera, si vous voulez bien lui donner la parole, avant la conclusion finale de M. l'agent du Nicaragua. Auparavant, je souhaite renouveler, Monsieur le Président, à vous-même et à la Cour, l'expression de ma vive gratitude pour votre bienveillance.

Professor BROWNLIE: Mr. President and Members of the Court. May it please the Court.

The purpose of my second speech in these proceedings is to provide a survey of the issues concerning the claims based upon general international law.

I do not expect to be on my feet for very long, because in general the issues concerning general international law probably do not present many difficulties.

However, there are certain points which I would like to draw to the attention of the Court, partly on account of their intrinsic merit and partly in order to emphasize the role of the causes of action founded upon general international law. The economy of formation of the rules of customary law leads to a certain disparity in the space needed for their exposure in contrast to that required to give an account of the many treaty-based obligations which are relevant to this case.

Whilst I may be in danger of stressing the obvious, I would like to stress that the Applicant State considers that the claims based upon customary or general international law are no less important than the treaty-based claims, and their importance is not prejudiced by the order of topics which has, of course, been adopted as a matter of convenient presentation.

The Role of the Customary Law Claims in the Present Case

The customary law claims may be seen to play two roles in the proceedings. In the first place, the heads of claim or causes of action of customary law reinforce and complement the claims based upon treaty obligations.

This complementary relationship exists in a variety of forms, and it will be sufficient if I offer some examples to the Court.

The obligation not to use force or the threat of force, as it exists in general international law, reinforces the provisions of the United Nations Charter. Indeed, there is an historical and functional interaction, since the norm of general international law antedates the provisions of Article 2 of the Charter: but at the same time the principle formulated in paragraph 4 of Article 2 has in itself provided new cement for the rule of general international law. As Nicaragua has indicated in its Memorial (IV, pp. 118-119, paras. 453-455), there is substantial authority for the view that the principles contained in Article 2 of the Charter form part of the customary law.

This complementarity between custom and treaty is also a characteristic of the principle of non-intervention. As in the case of the principles concerning the use of force, over a long period there has been a normative interaction, so that the transposition of the principle of non-intervention as between customary law and treaty provisions produces a process of mutual reinforcement and confirmation.

This complementary role played by the customary law causes of action does not stand alone, since customary law has an internal logic and versatility, which is characteristic of norms which grow out of actual experience. In addition, the rules of general international law supplement the rules derived from treaties.

Thus the customary law claims are not based exclusively upon the concept of the use or threat of force. Thus also the cause of action denominated "violations of the sovereignty of Nicaragua" is by no means confined to, though it certainly includes, episodes which involve the use or threat of force.

A further example, and, I submit, a particularly striking one, is provided by the obligation not to infringe the freedom of the high seas or to interrupt peaceful maritime commerce which is generally recognized as a facet of general international law. On the hypothesis that the provisions of the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation of 1956 were held to be inapplicable to the mining of Nicaraguan ports, this principle stands independently available.

The Causes of Action

Having affirmed the importance of customary law in these proceedings, I can now turn to the individual heads of claim.

(a) Violations of the Sovereignty of Nicaragua

Perhaps the most traditional and certainly the most comprehensive cause of action consists of the category of violations of the sovereignty of Nicaragua. Whilst many serious violations of the sovereignty of a State entail the use of force, this is by no means a necessary condition of responsibility. Indeed, the indispensable condition for this type of illegality is the actual exercise of some sovereign, that is State, function, within the sphere of sovereignty of another State, including its territorial sea and air space, without that State's consent. The prime characteristic is what a common law lawyer would describe as a trespass — a wrong to personality. It is the sovereign right of every State to determine the acts that will be performed within its territory. These qualities are evident from the practice of States which is referred to in Nicaragua's Memorial (IV, pp. 116-117). They are also very closely recorded in the pertinent entry in the work edited by Jules Basdevant, Dictionnaire de la terminologie du droit international, 1960, page 576 (letter G).

A particular characteristic of this cause of action is that it generates responsibility without proof of actual damage or loss. Or, to express the matter differently, the intrusion or usurpation of the jurisdictional sovereignty of the applicant State is itself a delict, and a duty of reparation arises even apart from proof of material damage, harm to citizens, or economic loss.

In sum, the violation of sovereignty as a cause of action has more than one function. In its major role it provides an extensive basis for responsibility, encompassing armed attacks against the territory of Nicaragua and forcible incursions into Nicaraguan waters. At the same time the category applies to cases of aerial trespass, whether or not the particular reconnaissance or other type of operation could be said to involve the use of force or of armed force.

(b) Breaches of the Obligation not to Use Force or the Threat of Force

I shall move on to what is surely the most significant and the most appropriate cause of action, that is the breaches by the United States of the obligation not to use force or the threat of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of Nicaragua. This obligation existing in general international law is substantially identical with the principle incorporated in Article 2, paragraph 4, of the United Nations Charter.

The rule is formulated in such a way as to extend to all forms of armed force, including minor uses of force. In addition, there can be no doubt whatsoever that the rule applies to all cases in which military operations are carried out by forces under the control of a State and acting as its agents.

In the present case there is an extensive pattern of evidence of breaches on the part of the United States of the customary law obligation not to resort to the use or threat of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State.

A high proportion of the evidence presented by Nicaragua relates to the persistent and systematic activities of the United States and its agents, involving armed attacks, sabotage operations, and multiple tactics of coercion and the propagation of terror among the civilian population of Nicaragua.

Mr. President, I would point to the content of that remarkable public document, the Report of the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence of the House of Representatives, dated 13 May 1983 (Memorial, Ann. E, Att. 1). This authoritative and substantial document describes the modus operandi of the military and paramilitary operations in Nicaragua by mercenaries acting under the direction and control of the United States. The implication of its terminology, the phrases used in this report could not be clearer.

The document refers to "hostilities" (IV, p. 245), and to "direct or indirect support of military or paramilitary activities in Nicaragua" (ibid.). Moreover, as the Memorial points out (at IV, p. 117), given that the report is concerned with an amendment to the Intelligence Authorization Act for the Fiscal Year 1983, it necessarily describes the purposes of the funding existing at that time as the background to an attempt to place constraints upon what the report describes as "United States support for military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua".

The picture of United States direct involvement in and control over the operations with which the Application is concerned in this case is confirmed by the documentary record in general, by the evidence of the witnesses called by the Applicant State, by the public statements of leaders of the mercenary forces, and also by the Edgar Chamorro affidavit.

The use of force has taken a variety of forms appropriate to the political convenience of the United States and to the specific purpose of the operations. The operations have two specific purposes, which are interrelated. The first is to coerce the Government of Nicaragua into acceptance of the political demands of the United States, and the second is, quite simply, the overthrow of the Government of Nicaragua by means of an orchestra of armed attacks, terrorist actions in the countryside, economic sabotage, interference with foreign trade, and military and naval demonstrations and manœuvres.

This orchestra of instruments of coercion involves systematic and persistent breaches of the obligation not to use force or the threat of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of Nicaragua. Each instrument is directed against the territorial integrity of Nicaragua and, given the overall aim of coercion, it is also directed against the country's political independence.

The threat of force is a significant aspect of this case, Mr. President, and some of the instruments in the orchestra of coercion are versatile. Thus the killing of civilians has the double purpose of interfering with the coffee harvest, thus directly causing economic damage, and at the same time bringing general pressure to bear upon the Government, in order to force it, in Mr. Reagan's memorable phrase, to "say Uncle".

In relation to the threat of force, I would respectfully draw the attention of the Court to the helpful commentary on this phrase provided by Eduardo Jiménez de Aréchaga, in his "General Course" at the Hague Academy. In his opinion:

"A threat of force is, for instance, the previous announcement of an act of violence, such as an ultimatum announcing recourse to military measures if certain demands are not accepted. A threat of force could also be implicitly conveyed by certain acts such as 'a demonstration of force for the purpose of exercising political pressure', the sudden concentration of troops in a border area in a situation of existing border dispute, or a display of force by means of warships close to the coasts of another State. A general mobilization could, in the context of a serious dispute, constitute a threat of force. On the other hand, an intensification of armaments in general might not be looked upon as such a threat." (Recueil des cours, Vol. 159 (1978-1), p. 88.)

One of the instruments of coercion has been the mining of Nicaragua's harbours, again with the double purpose of inflicting direct loss upon the economy by deterring foreign trade and at the same time contributing to the general policy of coercion directed against the Government of Nicaragua. This brings me to the head of claim in respect of:

(c) Breaches of the Obligation not to Infringe the Freedom of the High Seas or to Interrupt Peaceful Maritime Commerce

This obligation is well recognized in the sources of the law and these have been referred to in detail in the Memorial (IV, pp. 122-124). One of the precedents may be recalled for present purposes. I refer to the British Note dated 9 December 1946 delivered to the Albanian Government in the aftermath of the mining of British warships in the North Corfu Strait. On the question of principle the Note had this to say:

"19. His Majesty's Government must accordingly conclude that the Albanian Government either laid the minefield in question or knew that it had been laid. The Albanian Government has thus committed a flagrant breach of International Law. Under Articles 3 and 4 of the 8th Hague Convention of 1907 any Government laying mines in war-time, and a fortiori in peace, is bound to notify the danger zones to the Governments of all countries. (This obligation in fact applies even if the zones in question are not normally used by shipping.) Not only have the Albanian Government never made any public notification of this minefield but they have also made no comment on the continued issue of the relevant [Medri] charts and pamphlets. They thus endorsed a clear statement by the recognized international authority concerned in the shipping of the world that the Channel was safe for navigation. As a result, two of His Majesty's ships have been seriously damaged and forty-four innocent lives have been lost. Moreover, this conduct on the part of the Albanian Government menaced with destruction shipping of any kind using a Channel which is a normal and recognized route for international navigation."

It can be seen that this passage does not relate the responsibility exclusively to the status of the North Corfu Channel as an international strait. And the Note appears to represent what might be called the normal view of the United States Government on the point of principle, since that Note is given prominence in the Digest of International Law published by the Department of State and prepared under the direction of Marjorie Whiteman, then Assistant Legal Adviser (see Vol. 4 (1965), pp. 447-452).

Mr. President, the mining programme, which lasted from January until April of last year, is a remarkable example of irresponsible action by a major power. It was inevitably indiscriminate and could not qualify as collective self-defence even if such title of justification were applicable in limine. As a policy it was indefensible, and indeed it was not defended.

The responsibility of the United States was unequivocally recognized in a series of admissions, including admissions:

— by President Reagan, who described the episode as "much ado about nothing" at the interview on 28 May 1984 (Memorial, Ann. C, I, 6, IV, p. 176);
— by George Lauder, speaking on behalf of the CIA on 16 April 1984 (Ann. C, II, 5); and — by a Department of State spokesman on 10 May 1984 (Ann. C, II, 6, IV, p. 209).

And it is not surprising that a number of governments protested to the United States when the authorship of the mining programme became apparent (see Memorial, IV, p. 125).

Before I leave the issue of mining, with your permission, Mr. President, I shall indicate the precise legal consequences of the mining, which are surely threefold.

First, the mining operations involved persistent violations of the sovereignty of Nicaragua and thus generate responsibility even in the absence of proof of material loss or damage.

Second, there was specific damage to Nicaraguan shipping. Some of this damage was inflicted during mine-clearing operations undertaken by Nicaragua. However, in principle, such loss must be recoverable as an inevitable and natural consequence of the original wrongdoing. It may be recalled that the Canadian Statement of Claim concerning the consequences of the intrusion of the Cosmos 954 satellite into Canadian airspace included the cost of removing the potentially hazardous debris resulting from its disintegration (see 18 International Legal Materials (1979), p. 899 at p. 902; and also at p. 909).

Third, and cumulatively, the minings caused loss to the economy of Nicaragua consequential upon the interference with maritime commerce.

So much for the mining programme. I have now reached the penultimate of the causes of action based upon general international law which form part of my agenda, and that is:

(d) Breaches of the Obligation not to Kill, Wound or Kidnap Citizens of Nicaragua

It has been pointed out in the Memorial (IV, p. 126) that the legal bases of this claim consist of a wealth of jurisprudence of claims commissions and instances of State practice. In any case, quite apart from precedent and practice, this particular cause of action has a strong logical provenance, in that the duty which a State owes to aliens within its territory must apply with equal force to the persons of other nationalities affected by the operations of forces controlled and directed by the respondent State, whether within or without its frontiers.

Moreover, the military and paramilitary operations for which the United States has accepted responsibility have characteristics of particular relevance in the present context. No state of belligerency is acknowledged by the United States and the responsible officials have not once stated that the humanitarian law of warfare applies. If that view be correct, then the normal standards of State responsibility must remain applicable. Covert operations in the absence of the normal conditions of beligerency amount to nothing more than State-directed terrorism. The Court has been presented with a great deal of evidence of the planning and the execution of a programme of assassination and terror in the Nicaraguan countryside by forces under the control of the United States and I do not intend to rehearse the material at this juncture.

(e) Breaches of the Principle of Non-intervention

My colleague, Professor Pellet, has described the status and scope of the principle in some detail and my purpose is confined to indicating the role which the principle has in the general economy of Nicaragua's case.

In a geneal way, the evidence of the breaches of the principle of non-intervention is identical with the evidence which is material in relation to violations of sovereignty and breaches of the obligation not to resort to the use or threat of force.

However, the principle of non-intervention has a specific role to play in certain respects and these can be indicated briefly and partly by way of memorandum.

First, the principle of non-intervention is more extensive than the concept of the use of force and this is particularly true of acts of "dictatorial interference" some of which may not fall easily or at all within the categories of "armed attack", the "use of force", or the "threat of force".

Second, intervention, both when it overlaps with the use of force and also when it extends beyond that category, has its classical field of application in relation to coercive action which has the purpose of overthrowing the lawful government of another State.

The relevant documentary evidence in the present case reveals that effectively all of the military and paramilitary activities aimed at the Government and people of Nicaragua have one of two purposes, which are compatible and can exist and be implemented in combination:

(a) The actual overthrow of the existing lawful Government of Nicaragua and its replacement by a government acceptable to the United States; and

(b) the substantial damaging of the economy, and the weakening of the political system, in order to coerce the Government of Nicaragua into the acceptance of United States policies and political demands.

The third and final particular characteristic of the category of intervention which I would like to mention, is of special relevance to the present case. The purpose of self-defence, and necessarily also of collective self-defence, has nothing in common with the general political objectives of the United States in Central America and nothing in common with a policy of dictatorial interference in the internal affairs of the applicant State. Thus the mining of ports and a policy of terror against Nicaraguan citizens are methods which have much in common with a policy of intervention but nothing in common with the concept of self-defence.

By way of bringing this survey of the causes of action to a conclusion, with your permission, Mr. President, I would remind the Court of the Final Act of the Helsinki Conference of 1975 (see Brownlie, Basic Documents on Human Rights, 2nd ed., p. 320; International Legal Materials, Vol. 14 (1975), p. 1292).

This instrument, of course, refers to European issues of concern but its 35 adherents include the United States, and the Final Act contains, and indeed gives special prominence to, a "Declaration on Principles Guiding Relations between Participating States". In the preamble to this Declaration one of the recitals reads as follows:

"Expressing their common adherence to the principles which are set forth below and are in conformity with the Charter of the United Nations, as well as their common will to act, in the application of these principles, in conformity with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations . . ."

There follow ten principles. Nearly all of these have some relevance to the facts of the present case, but the more material items are as follows:

First: respect for sovereign equality;
Second: refraining from the use or threat of force;
Third: the territorial integrity of States;
Fourth: non-intervention in internal affairs; and Fifth: respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms.

The text of the second principle is of special significance, since it concerns the use of force. It is carefully drafted, thus:

> "The participating States will refrain in their mutual relations, as well as in their international relations in general, from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any State, or in any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations and with the present Declaration. No consideration may be invoked to serve to warrant resort to the threat or use of force in contravention of this principle.
> Accordingly, the participating States will refrain from any acts constituting a threat of force or direct or indirect use of force against another participating State. Likewise they will refrain from any manifestation of force for the purpose of inducing another participating State to renounce the full exercise of its sovereign rights. Likewise they will also refrain in their mutual relations from any act of reprisal by force.
> No such threat or use of force will be employed as a means of settling disputes, or questions likely to give rise to disputes, between them."

Mr. President, it is obvious that the Final Act is not a treaty and is not as such a legally binding text. But the part of the Final Act to which I have given emphasis is clearly intended to be declaratory of existing principles of general international law.

This part of the Helsinki Final Act thus stands as evidence of the status of the principles concerned as general international law and also as evidence of the adherence of the United States to those principles as formulated in the Final Act. This aspect of the instrument has been noted by Ouchakov in his contribution to the Essays in Honour of Judge Manfred Lachs published last year (pp. 217-233), and indeed it is evident from the preamble of the Declaration of Principles. The same Declaration is included in the Digest of United States Practice in International Law, 1975, page 7, under the rubric "Rights and Duties of States".

The Relation Between the Causes of Action Based upon Customary Law

In conclusion I shall make some very tentative points about the relationship of the various causes of action or, if you will, heads of liability. The issues with which I am now concerned will be evident if I state some propositions.

First: it may be assumed that if the Applicant State succeeds on all or any one of the customary law causes of action, the consequence will be full recovery of compensation for all losses, both direct and consequential.

Second: there are certain exceptions to the first proposition, which are probably as follows:

(i) in the case of the minings the compensation would reflect only that loss and damage which flowed from the minings; and
(ii) in the case of unlawful killing, wounding and kidnapping of Nicaraguan citizens the claim is, so to speak, mixed, consisting partly of a claim by way of diplomatic protection on behalf of the nationals involved and partly of a claim for consequential loss to the economy of Nicaragua.

Third: in the case of the violations of the sovereignty of Nicaragua, reparation is in principle due without proof of material loss (but this of course is without prejudice to this claim providing a foundation for the general claim of Nicaragua for compensation due).

These propositions, which are now concluded, are to a degree premature, since the Court has been formally requested to deal with the general issue of compensation in a subsequent phase of the proceedings. However, the prematurity is deliberate and, it is submitted, inevitable, since, when the Court is considering the issues of responsibility as such, it may be necessary, at least in a preliminary way, to bear in mind the logical interaction between the different heads of liability and certain specific questions of compensation.

The points I have just made concerning this logical interaction are provisional and intended simply to indicate the existence of certain types of question.

In making such points, it is not supposed that the existence of various heads of liability side by side is an inevitable source of complications. Nor is the multiplicity of grounds of claim to be regarded as artificial or in any way unusual. The various legal systems of the world are perfectly familiar with this phenomenon, and it is reflected in the pages of the International Encyclopaedia of Comparative Law (see Vol. XI, Torts (ed.), Tunc., Chap. 12). The resort to multiple grounds of claim is entirely natural since the various causes of action reflect two important aspects of reality.

One form of reality is the recognition which the law, both customary and conventional, gives to the various priorities of States, marking out the areas of intolerable conduct and giving substance to social standards.

The other form of reality is the delictual topography of this case. The various grounds of claim invoked by Nicaragua provide an economical and yet very clear picture of the orchestra of instruments of coercion — the conduct of which complaint is made to this Court, and thus the Application is a natural reflection both of the facts and of the realism which lies behind the causes of action found in general international law.

Mr. President, that concludes my consideration of, as it might be, the tactical role of the causes of action based on general international law. And now by way of an envoie I want to look at a separate question: this is the final speech of counsel in this proceeding before the speech of the Agent. My envoie relates to questions concerning the role of the Court in cases in which compliance by the respondent State is expected to be partial or otherwise problematic.

The matters to which I shall address myself are not directly connected with the substantive issues in this case. At the same time, in my submission, they are not directed to matters which are extra-judicial, either. They are relevant, in my submission, to matters which could be described as relevant to the judicial atmosphere in which the Court approaches the points of substance, and in that context I shall address myself to particular considerations, particular preoccupations of the Applicant State, and I shall, of course, be speaking entirely within my role as counsel of the Republic of Nicaragua.

By way of preface, I would like to refer to the general problem of non-compliance with the decisions of courts. It would be facile, although it is often assumed in academic circles to be so, it would be facile to assume that the problem of non-compliance is peculiar to international tribunals. Those who think that have usually done very little thinking about the problem of compliance with municipal law. And yet it is not necessary to look very far to see many examples of situations in municipal law where non-compliance is so to speak hidden or pre-empted by devices which are so familiar that we barely notice what is happening. The use of amnesty laws for example, the use of instruments which are constitutional to change decisions of courts. In Britain the War Damage Act of 1964 did not merely change the law, it literally expunged the result of a particular decision of the highest court, the House of Lords. Another example is provided by the case of Brown v. Board of Education, in the United States Supreme Court, 347 US 489 (1952), a very important decision, familiar to all, on racial discrimination. The Supreme Court of the United States actually envisaged the problems of non-compliance by requiring execution "with all deliberate speed". The court thus faced the problem that one would expect in the actual political situation. Amnesty laws are perhaps the simplest example of what I am referring to. And the problem of course is that one may be tempted, a court may be tempted so to speak, to move towards compliance or part compliance by a certain element of conciliation or moderation, which involves trying to ensure a sort of compatibility which may risk almost seeming to legitimize illegality or simply adjusting the law to the facts. Now, that is the situation that may obtain in municipal law.

In this Court there are familiar problems involving the non-appearance of respondent States and I do not intend to go into that general question or into the very interesting issues raised in the literature. My concern with the problem of non-appearance, is simply that non-appearance is a symptom of the possibility, an indication of non-compliance by the Respondent State, either concurrently with the decision of the Court or perhaps later on after the decision of the Court, in the final phase of the proceedings. It is true to say that the ultimate juncture is often not reached. In the Fisheries Jurisdiction cases, the law, the substantive law relating to matters in the Law of the Sea, was about to change anyway. In the Nuclear Tests cases, the claim was held to be inadmissible and in the Aegean Sea case, the Court decided that it did not have jurisdiction. However in the Hostages case, as in the present proceedings, the Court reached the position where it held that it had jurisdiction and the claim was admissible and thus moved on to the merits. And so, you have a situation which is not for the first time but for the second time, where the Court has faced the problem of non-appearance and moved on to the merits.

In this case there are certain special circumstances. In the first place, the non-appearing State is a major power in conflict with a small developing State. Now, this is significant in my respectful submission, because the evolution of international law in the second part of this century has in its way been very remarkable. When I learnt some international law first, early in the 1950s, the great question in the United Kingdom and the west generally was, how could the so-called new States, what was later called the "third world", be persuaded to use the International Court, could be persuaded to resort to international tribunals? Well, the fact is that there is a lot of evidence that the third world is resorting to international tribunals and these proceedings are by no means the only example. And, of course, some States resort to the Court itself, some to a chamber of the Court and some to special courts of arbitration like the one concerned with the case between the two Guineas. And the fact is that the third world is a part of the Court and its process and has expectations concerning the Court. Nor should this be a matter of surprise, because the system of diplomacy is multi-cultural, should be multi-cultural and has for some long period been multi-cultural. Judge Ago has dealt with the evidence of that in an interesting article in the British Year Book of International Law not long ago (Vol. 53 (1982), p. 213).

Mr. President, against that background, I would move to the particular considerations that I want to place before the Court on behalf of the Applicant State. This case is not about Nicaragua alone, it is about a certain modus operandi of coercion, an orchestra of instruments of coercion, which may affect and does affect in the world we see about us many small States with powerful neighbours.

In the African Continent, the States of Angola and Mozambique feature in recent examples of this type of orchestra of coercion. The problem is this: in a case of this kind, the Court — any court — has a considerable discretion, a considerable power of appreciation of the evidence, the multiplicity of issues, the difficulties, and it might be that a decision was to the effect that those claims relating to the covert war were not upheld; that is one of the many choices open to the Court. My submission is that if that were the outcome of this case, although it would not be the technical finding of the Court, in the diplomatic world to politicians, to the world as it is, such a finding would appear to be a legitimation of a certain type of coercion, directed against weak States by powerful States. In my humble submission that would be a serious threat to the public order of the world as it now is.

If I could return for a moment to the issue of non-compliance, even in cases where there is a measure of non-compliance; for example, the Corfu Channel case, especially at the compensation stage; or the United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran case, it is a strange fact (strange in the sense that it is not often pointed to) that in spite of the non-compliance with the Judgment in the Corfu Channel case, that case is regarded as an important source of principle on some important questions of international law. So with the United States Diplomatic and Consular Staff in Tehran case, which was a case in a crisis, it was a case with the most difficult provenance. The Court faced the issues, the Court made a series of important pronouncements on key matters of the law relating to diplomatic relations; and therefore, even in a situation where it may be expected that compliance will be either partial or there will be a complete non-compliance, what the Court does is enormously important in the actual context of international public order.

I have referred to the problem of appearing to legitimize covert war, a certain type of modus operandi of coercion. As a sort of supplement to that observation I would like to put the following hypothesis in front of the Court.

The hypothesis concerns a small State and a period of five or six years. In the first year of the five- or six-year period we will assume that there is evidence of arms moving across the frontier of that small State into a neighbouring State. If it appeared that the Court believed that such a set of facts justified the type of coercion brought to bear by the United States over a period of four or five years, long after the original hypothetical traffic in arms had ceased, and that it could justify the massive use of a variety of forms of coercion over that period of four or five years; in my submission that would be virtually a return to the concept visible in the 1930s in Europe, the diplomacy of provocation, where some original event is taken as a justification for a long sequence of coercion.

I am coming to my final remark, which is simply this: against the background of what I have already said I think it would be particularly unfortunate if findings were to be based upon evidence not placed before the Court by the Parties.

QUESTION PUT BY JUDGE RUDA

Judge RUDA : Nicaragua has referred, in her Memorial and in the course of these pleadings, to alleged United States violation of provisions of the United Nations Charter, the Charter of the Organization of American States, the Treaty of Friendship, Commerce and Navigation of 1956, and customary rules of international law.

However, in your Application you have referred not only to the United Nations Charter and the Charter of the Organization of American States, but also to Article 8 of the Convention of Rights and Duties of States, signed in Montevideo in 1933, and Article 1 (3) of the Convention concerning the Duties and Rights of States in the Event of Civil Strife, signed in Havana in 1928. Could you comment as to why you have not referred to these two instruments in the subsequent periods on the merits after the Application? I do not want a reply now, you can reply after these oral pleadings, in writing, at a suitable time.

STATEMENT BY MR. ARGÜELLO GÓMEZ

AGENT FOR THE GOVERNMENT OF NICARAGUA

Mr. ARGÜELLO GÓMEZ: Mr. President, Members of the Court. This is my last intervention in this most important phase of this case. During the past year and a half it has been my privilege and honour to defend the cause of my country before this highest and most respected tribunal on earth. I feel an immense responsibility. The cause of my country is also the cause of all the small nations on earth, who see in the rule of law their only means of survival. The cause of my country is, and has been, the cause of Latin America.

Many of the legal principles here at stake have been created and espoused by a distinguished line of Latin-American jurists over the past 150 years. These principles have been formulated for the very purpose of mobilizing the force of international law as a defence against the innumerable interventions of the United States in Latin America. They are the antitheses of the policy of the "big stick" which has permeated, and still permeates, the attitude of the United States toward Latin America, a policy that has been applied with particular cruelty to Nicaragua during its entire existence as a nation.

Mr. President, Nicaragua has made a comprehensive presentation of its case in fact and law in the written and oral pleadings already before you. Another speech is not necessary. I wish only to review, in the fewest words possible, the matters that have been the subject of our proceedings in the past few days.

In this phase of the proceedings, Nicaragua has presented five witnesses in oral testimony. I would like to say a word about the testimony of each of them.

Nicaragua's position on the question of arms supplied to El Salvador remains the same as it was at the beginning of the case and as it always has been. We have never varied from that position. When we filed our Application it was accompanied by an affidavit from our Foreign Minister, Father Miguel d'Escoto. He swore that: "In truth, my Government is not engaged and has not been engaged in the provision of arms or supplies to either of the factions engaged in the civil war in El Salvador."

Last week we produced in Court another senior member of the Nicaraguan Government, Commander Luis Carrión, the Vice-Minister of the Interior. He testified in open court and was subject to vigorous questioning from the Bench. On this point he said, in response to a question from the Court:

> "My Goverment has never had a policy of sending arms to opposition forces in Central America. That does not mean that this did not happen, especially in the first years after the revolution, in 1979 and 1980. Weapons might have been carried through Nicaraguan territory, weapons that might have the Salvadoran insurgents as you said, as the final recipients."

One has got to agree that there might have been arms going through Nicaragua to the Salvadoran rebels at that time, but not as a matter of government policy. Nicaragua denies also that there were several training facilities provided for headquarters for the Salvadoran rebels. Nicaragua's counsel have also stated that they hold the same views as the Government on all matters relating to these proceedings and that they have never said anything to the contrary.

Nicaragua brought Mr. MacMichael before the Court because we thought he could provide information that was important to the case. He was the one person who has seen all the evidence in the possession of the United States relating to the supply of arms to the Salvadoran guerrillas during the period of time that is relevant to this case. Thirdly, in 1981 when the United States policy was formulated and thereafter, he was the one person who could testify on the basis of evidence that there had been no such traffic during that crucial period.

We knew, of course, what his opinions were as to the earlier period, and that because he was giving oral testimony he would be asked to express them. But I would point out to the Court that his actual testimony is not inconsistent with Nicaragua's position: when asked whether the evidence which is sure about arms traffic to El Salvador, in the earlier period, established that the Government of Nicaragua was involved during that period, he replied that it was not.

Nicaragua's next two witnesses testified, in painful and graphic detail, about the terrorist activities of the contra forces against the people of Nicaragua. Both were asked from the Bench about alleged violations of human rights by the Nicaraguan Government. Of course, both witnesses denied any knowledge of such practices. On this issue, we have put before the Court the reports of several independent organizations that monitor the observation of human rights in various countries of the world. Let me draw the Court's attention to one of these, entitled: Human Rights in Nicaragua: Reagan, Rhetoric and Reality prepared by Americas Watch, which specializes in human rights conditions in the western hemisphere — it is contained in Supplemental Annex E, and it says:

> "In Nicaragua there is no systematic practice of forced disappearances, extra-judicial killings or torture. Nor has the Government practised elimination of culture or ethnic groups as the administration frequently claims. For the past two years the most violent abuses of human rights in Nicaragua have been committed by the contras. Here, too, the administration has substituted rhetoric for a clear look at the facts. After several outside investigations into contra practices, we find that contra combattants systematically murdered the unarmed including medical personnel, rarely take prisoners and force civilians into collaboration."

In its final conclusions the Americas Watch report also makes these points:

> "1. Far from being the moral centre of United States policy towards Nicaragua, human rights have been used to justify a policy of confrontation.
> 2. To that end human rights data have been distorted in the annual State Department's Country Reports on Nicaragua, in White House handouts on Nicaragua the speeches and public statements by senior officials and, most notably, in the President's own remarks on Nicaragua.
> 3. Such misuse of human rights to justify military interference in United States Latin American relations is an unprecedented debasement of the human rights cause."

And, speaking of credibility, in the light of these findings about the character of United States statements on human rights in Nicaragua, what are we to think about United States public statements on other issues in this case, for example, arms supply. Mr. William Huper the Finance Minister of Nicaragua, was our last witness. As the Court may already be aware, he was examined exclusively on matters relating to economic damage caused to Nicaragua by the hostile activities of the United States. Mr. Huper's evidence was intended to provide a certain background to the case as presented on liability; it was not intended to constitute a definitive basis for Nicaragua's claim to compensation. As to that,

Nicaragua has requested that the Court reserve the general question of compensation for a separate phase of the case.

Mr. President, Nicaragua does not accept the thesis that Article 53 of the Statute means that the Court shall act as counsel for the non-appearing State. Article 53 cannot be understood to mean that a non-appearing State should have more rights than it would if it had appeared before the Court. In particular, Article 53 does not mean that a respondent, which normally would bear the burden of proof of an affirmative defence, can shift the burden to the applicant simply by refusing to appear; all Article 53 states is that there is no right to a default judgment and that the Court has to satisfy itself on the merits of the case. It certainly does not mean that the Court is to supply the pleadings that the absent party might have made and, even more, to introduce factual materials that are not in the record, that have not been subjected to the critical analysis of the adversary process. That would be to penalize the State appearing before this tribunal. It would also impose on counsel, and particularly the Agent of the appearing State, the embarrassment of having to submit to statements that might be made by the Court along the lines of a pleading and that could not — because of the respect owed to each and every member of the tribunal — be answered with the necessary liberty of expression.

The United States has refused to appear before this tribunal but it has not been silent during the past few days. While Nicaragua has been presenting its case in accordance with the Statute and Rules of the Court, the United States has been presenting its case in the press. I need not remind the Court that these statements and documents do not constitute evidence in this case, and cannot properly be considered by the Court. The chairs on the other side of the courtroom provide the true measure of the United States case — it is as empty as they are.

Mr. President, Members of the Court, on behalf of Nicaragua I make the following submissions. The Republic of Nicaragua respectfully requests the Court to grant the following relief:

First: the Court is requested to adjudge and declare that the United States has violated the obligations of international law indicated in the Memorial, and that in particular respects the United States is in continuing violation of those obligations.

Second: the Court is requested to state in clear terms the obligation which the United States bears to bring to an end the aforesaid breaches of international law.

Third: the Court is requested to adjudge and declare that, in consequence of the violations of international law indicated in the Memorial, compensation is due to Nicaragua, both on its own behalf and in respect of wrongs inflicted upon its nationals; and the Court is requested further to receive evidence and to determine, in a subsequent phase of the present proceedings, the quantum of damages to be assessed as the compensation due to the Republic of Nicaragua.

Fourth: without prejudice to the foregoing request, the Court is requested to award to the Republic of Nicaragua the sum of 370,200,000 United States dollars, which sum constitutes the minimum valuation of the direct damages, with the exception of damages for killing nationals of Nicaragua, resulting from the violations of international law indicated in the substance of its Memorial.

With reference to the fourth request, the Republic of Nicaragua reserves the right to present evidence and argument, with the purpose of elaborating the minimum (and in that sense provisional) valuation of direct damages and, further, with the purpose of claiming compensation for the killing of nationals of Nicaragua and consequential loss in accordance with the principles of international law in respect of the violations of international law generally, in a subsequent phase of the present proceedings in case the Court accedes to the third request of the Republic of Nicaragua.

Mr. President, Members of the Court, while we talk here in The Hague, the mercenary war goes on in Nicaragua. Since these hearings began last week, more than 50 people have been killed, wounded or kidnapped in my country, as a result of that war. As the Court knows, Article 74 of the Rules of Court provides that a request for provisional measures shall take priority over all other matters before the Court. This is obviously because such requests are inherently of an urgent nature calling for immediate relief. The same reasoning should apply to cases of the nature of the one before the Court. Nicaragua requests that this case should be given all the priority it deserves. When Nicaragua asked for interim measures of protection, the Court responded in full conformity to the requirements of the rule, in issuing its Order indicating interim measures on 10 May 1984. In the 16 months since then the United States has completely flouted the Court's Order. Nicaragua's need for relief, Nicaragua's demand for justice remains as urgent now as it was then. Mr. President, Members of the Court, Nicaragua has completed the presentation of its case, it remains for you to respond to that need and that demand.

CLOSING OF THE ORAL PROCEEDINGS

The PRESIDENT: Before we rise I must draw attention to the normal practice of the Court whereby the Agents of the Parties remain at its disposal to provide any further evidence or explanation that may be required.

I now declare the present hearing closed.

The Court rose at 2 p.m.
